I can see this site dying after a few days. What makes you so sure you're website isn't like other coding based forums?

I think your main site needs a little more design work. You don't have equal margin/padding for your sections, and in my opinion the main text in the body is too heavy.

However, I am too designing a coding website. Im not expecting anything to come from it, I'm literally only doing it to keep myself busy whilst Im not studying.

Spoiler (Click to View)

But yeah, I started this design early this morning.

Either way, good luck with you site dude

How come man? You've got a pretty decent domain, with a little bit of effort and marketing, you could get that generating visitors with the right content.

You should go on Shark Tank, that show is great.

You don't need to buddy.

Honestly, get a decent design sorted for your main site. Then create a basic splash page with email sign ups. Then, just create the first two or three tutorials for each language. So, for myself. Im doing UI/UX Design in Photoshop, HTML, CSS/SASS/, Javascript, PHP, RoR, Python, iOS Development in Swift, and Android Development.

I've been making tutorials for about 3 months now, but I only have around 3 for each language. Once I launch the site, Ill post all the tutorials. After that, I'll see what's the most popular and see where the traffic is going.

It's just about having a good market plan bro, it's all about quality not quantity. Aim for decent quality videos. There's nothing worse than a 10 min video that explains jack shit, each video only needs to be about 3/5 minutes. You just need to split them down in to good functioning segments etc

That's just C++ with Microsoft extensions so that programmers can write code for the .net framework. And it's not even called C++ it's called C++/CLI.

So you need to change the name to C++/CLI which would mean you have no C++ section.
