The Keyboard Is Dead. Long Live the Conversation.

Technology is shifting from screens to sound.

People don’t even know how to write anymore — so why would they need to know how to read? The factory of fools is running full speed; humanity is turning into dependents.

Is there true for others? I don't use my voice for almost any commands or to talk to AI assistants. I have in the past but that was when I did video calls with ChatGPT to have it look at something for me. Its not a regular thing and I'm surprised to hear as many as 50% of searches are voice based. I guess I do know some older people that ask siri a lot of questions.

I like reading. I process things quicker than listening. I also get impatient with the speed at which voices relay information.

I'll keep my keyboard, thanks.

Agreed, this is happening whether we like it or not. Most new kids don't buy trad computers w/ keyboards unless they are gaming or have a specific reason.

There are concerning trends about how many people are graduating with tech-aligned degrees, or finance degrees, or other office job degrees... and they can barely use modern computers.

The voice to text technology has definitely not improved at the rate of AI
Try and learn Cantonese with a AI assistant i dare you

Quote:However, their capabilities are evolving rapidly. They are no longer passive responders to our commands; they are becoming proactive, predictive, and emotionally aware.

But who even wants this?

Siri has been around since 2011. I like when I ask a question, I get a response back. I don't need or want anything else.

Saying the keyboard is dead is an exaggeration, but talking to AI assistants is definitely more efficient now.
