Thread: Do .NET Crypters have longer FUD time than VB6/ASM crypters?

U STRAIGHT RATCHY - December 10, 2011, 11:19 pm

Title says it all, I'm just curious because I seems like it haha

?4???4?™ - December 11, 2011, 2:29 am

For me no.

Depend on how good the coder is and what method he use.

Pijm0 - January 16, 2012, 9:52 am

As said, it all depends on the coder...

CAPiiX - January 16, 2012, 9:54 am

I wouldn't necessarily say that it depends on the coder, but it more depends on how many people are on the crypter. I wouldn't buy a crypter that is sticky if I were you.

JeromeMarshall - January 18, 2012, 1:32 pm

I seem to think so.

My theory is people who still use vb are fairly oldschool. oldschool programmers are usually all about the open source and sharing. nowadays so many kids copy and paste codes, modify a few lines, and keep it to themselves or use fileic3. can't coment on ASM but i would assume it actually would stay fud longer as less people are capable of programming it, and the people that can are usually smart enough to prevent to prevent it from being detected too early.

That thread may generates many different replies but the simple answer is NO and actually i agree totally with ?4???4?™.

you can go and look into the crypter reviews in place of grave digging.

Bull™ - April 27, 2016, 3:43 am

Its depend on the Coder and Depend on your spreading method. like if you using exploit for spread then it can be detected soon does not matter what crypter are you using and its coded in what language.

Gvuandrew3 - May 24, 2016, 6:04 am

I need a crypter that works with nano rat and where I can get a PERSONAL stub. Of course I'll pay extra for that. I need to know how much it will cost and if it's 100% fud with all AV's and how long it lasts

Please PM me, don't reply to thread as I'm not following the thread or contact me at jabber @ jabberdude@jabbim.cz
