[img]http://i1217.photobucket.com/albums/dd388/xForsakenSniper/XFS1.gif[/img]You have done a mistake.

Do not put transparency on.

Also when you make a new document never choose 'Transparency'

xForsakenSniper - December 30, 2011, 5:25 am

Yeah I learned that a hard way, 3 uploads later and I figured it out.

Even though this is very simple and easy to do I suppose not many new Photoshop users would know how to do this, so thank you for the effort. However, I would recommend on using a more modern style in your graphics work next time, something a bit more web 2.0 or even a metro effect would be nice.

Save it as GIF and don't put transparency on.

When I come to the stage to create a new layer, here is what happens:

[img]http://i41.[censored].com/2ilya00.png[/img]

For some reason the layer seems to be automatically set to transparent mode or something and even though I went into layer properties, I couldn't find a solution to this.

After doing the following: create a new layer, use the brush to make the line, right-click and choose clipping-mask, duplicate the frame, I come to the stage where I press CTRL + --> but the line I created using the brush doesn't appear at all. It then re-appears when I release the clipping-mask.

That animation is just poor.

Your better off just lowering the opacity and distance of that drop shadow and cutting out that animation and just save it as is.
