How could I check for working netflix accounts?

muzzy. - June 5, 2013, 6:35 am

Found a few persistent XSS's on a pretty big website and I'm slowly redirecting them all to a picture of [censored].

I've got 4/5 redirecting at the moment but the other won't go for some reason.

Tried

<script>window.location.href
="http://www.wired.com/images_blogs/threatlevel/2011/07/[censored]-660x412.png"</script>
<script>window.location =
"http://www.wired.com/images_blogs/threatlevel/2011/07/[censored]-660x412.png"</script>
```

I dunno if an iframe would work though so I haven't tried it. Also on the chat system I changed my name to `<script>alert("XSS")</script>` via Tamperdata and it just comes up with a blank name instead of the alert. Any ideas?

Yes, this is a test ?

Yes, this is a test ?To be fair, i dont know alot about XSS.

Also, not sure if this is true, but some times, putting " before the error line could help, but like i said, im not sure of that.

There are quite a few tuts here on HF.

I reconomend you to learn a coding language, either c#, c++, java or anything else.

It really depends on what 'hacking stuff' you wanna learn.

The fact that you made an attempt to answer shows you're more dedicated than most that run desks here.

+3 & a vouch for this helpdesk; good luck.

The only way i could think of, is either SE'ing/doxing.

SE'ing means that you will have to search contact with him/her, and try to win their trust.

DOXing means that you have to use the internet to find more info about the email, to see if it is used anywhere else, etc.

Like i said;

Code I [b]think[/b] that there is no possible way, you need to try to acces their other databases, and search for the user information.

what are you trying to proof?

Im just here trying to help you.
