Thread: [Professional GUIs\[CHEAP\]\[NO .DLLs!\]](#)

You Are Free - May 5, 2010, 12:19 pm

I can make professional looking GUIs FROM IMAGES, no extra DLLs needed. Also, these GUIs WON'T BE STATIC. That means, say, the "exit" button, when you put your mouse over it, instead of staying the same, it will "glow" or "change" in some way.

I can do this for any IDE out there if I can get my hands on it.

I'll take a free one but I'm not ub3r, but still first to post haha

Read my text carefully, your not qualified.

Not even an ub3r wants one?

Sobriety - May 6, 2010, 11:55 am

You need to post some previous work, just do a few designs for the portfolio.

OP Wrote:As I have not done this for anyone, I will provide one free GUI to a ub3r member, reply to get it done(first serious ub3r reply only).

That says I'm doing one for free, and that one will be the first addition to my portfolio. Why I can't post my previous work that inspired me starting this service is because the project is secret and hasn't been released yet.

Instead of doing a free one I created a new application. Now in my portfolio.

'Slick' GUIs would sell for more than ones like these- which comes off as cluttered and messy.

Just my opinion. Codejock is really nice, I see no reason to not use it ;)

To me GUIs made with code.jock or dotnetbar are crappy because the user put little or no effort into the gui, they also require a dll.

I did another one! Check my portfolio.

that's interesting, do you seriously just make a GUI or do you write a full application to? also people should be reminded to have visual basic runtime files installed for a (VB6) GUI and you didn't specify what .NET framework ie; 2.0/3.5/4.0 etc..
because they obviously need it to be installed.

your writing these in VB/C#/C++ .NET doesn't matter all compiles down to the same CLR code anyways.

Well, of course my GUIs can be ported to another Microsoft language.

I can write full applications, my first example in my portfolio was made and programmed by me, my second was made by me for a friend as a phishing application(you should have seen his version XD)

And the framework depends on what you set it to, since these are just images made specifically for the program, the code used to make it dynamic is simple, and the code to make it drag able, is also simple.

Anyone else? It seems people would rather fuck themselves over Codejock or dotnetbar just so they are lazy...

I've never seen yours, I've been making GUIs like this for around 6 months, most of them never get released, or some of them I release on other forums.

Edit: Holy shit, unk. I never saw your thread XD, you've obviously been doing this a whole lot longer than I have.

Edit 2: I also just released your better at making background images, but you seem to have a harder time with the X button at the top right. Also, if you notice my applications are rounded around the corner, yours aren't.

Still available, get one now for your program! Multiple forms! Custom scripting if needed!

I'm bumping this up as I have seen so many people ripping my(and unk.'s) idea.
