Thread: [Most popular OmniCoin online wallet! \[SSL\]](#)

Alex™ - April 9, 2014, 8:00 pm

Yes, I know I'm a bit late.

This was made as a redundancy: <http://omc-wallet.com/wallet>

Please keep in mind that I do not do frontend work so it might look like shit. Also I'm currently working on it so I do not have errors turned off, sorry if you run into any, they should dissappear quickly. I assure you this is quite safe however not a coldwallet since I suck at JS. This will show you having the money after 6 confirmations.

Again, sorry for the frontend, I'll work on that later :P

Transaction fee : set to the default 0.01

I take security incredibly seriously however I do not take responsibility for your coins. People have tried to hack us and have failed however I cannot secure against future 0days. Just because I say this does not mean I don't care about your coins, I clearly do care about them.

As-long as you have the latest version of OpenSSL (Anything more recent than 1.0.1F) you should be fine. Just get 1.0.1G and you'll be good until someone else finds a vuln in OpenSSL.

Or don't want the trouble of having to open it and wait for it to sync. Right now it's fast but if you leave it for a while it'll be slow as fuck. BitcoinD takes about 18 hours on a DC connection to sync.

It also means your internet connection is not constantly being used when you're uploading stuff.

It's also great for when you're on your phone/tablet/school/anywhere but home

Yeah I will do later today. Wallet might be down for 10 mins while I implement a really good security feature. Anyway, if the site gets hacked after this your wallets should be totally safe, I will just upload a backed up wallet and the hacker would have a wallet that is encrypted to fuck. There are ways around it but that goes for every security measure in the world.

The site was hacked because Alex didn't have enough understanding of how cryptocurrencies and their wallets work. I don't think there is a whole lot of explaining they can do.

Ignorance, not laziness. Please don't be rude, I provided a free service where I paid for the domains, the hosting and put a hell of a lot of time into the project. Users were not forced to use it and did so at their own risk.

I didn't have a say in the matter. I had a pretty good understanding of how they work, I just overlooked something.

Quote: it had to do with shared wallets and the ability to export private keys. Your wallet would send the OMC which is the oldest, by default. That means that people who let their OMC sit for awhile then exported their private key could continuously deposit into your online wallet and then send OMC from there as well as the OMC client using the private key they exported. They could then use that method to empty out the entire hot wallet of any online wallet that used shared wallets. And yes, there was 2 or 3 others that had the same thing happen to them as yours did.

inb4 people say they told me about this; They didn't.

EDIT: compared to "According to AllCrypt 2.5 million OMC were stolen from their wallets via an exploit in the network." this is a drop in the bucket. I guess OMC has had its highs and lows.

FRANKIE - February 19, 2015, 12:35 pm

Doctor Blue - February 19, 2015, 1:04 pm

My 2 cents are that this all happened due to human error. It is possible to overlook something, and had Abraham Lincoln not told me, I would probably have made the same mistake at some point. It's just a shame that nobody found and reported it instead.

Yes.

I'm working on a website that involves the bitcoin daemon at the moment, so if anyone has any more more "exploits" they know of please let me know.

I did my best. I told people to use it at their own risk, I think it was at the top of the thread at one point. I only spent ~16 hours in jail, I was on bail for ~9 months with the condition that I could not use the internet.

Nope. Not back, just not on bail any more.

A long time ago.

I didn't have a say in the matter. I had a pretty good understanding of how they work, I just overlooked something.

inb4 people say they told me about this; They didn't.

EDIT: compared to "According to AllCrypt 2.5 million OMC were stolen from their wallets via an exploit in the network." this is a drop in the bucket. I guess OMC has had its highs and lows. Hurr I provided a free service. Don't feed me that kind of bullshit please, I'm not stupid as you took a small fee on each and every amount of OMC being sent. Nobody truly does anything out of goodwill.

You did your best? Lol. Let me put it another way: You ditched us when we needed you the most. I understand you were on bail but you didn't do jack shit once you were back.

You didn't have a say? Mate, if you had developed your wallet in a better way and didn't half-ass it, the 190k OMC theft wouldn't have happened if I recall well.

Please, no more bullshit. We both know the OMC values were much, MUCH higher a year ago. If you had looked into potential exploits (ONES THAT HAPPENED WITH OTHER WALLETS ONCE YOU WERE STILL HERE), we wouldn't have lost all those OMCs to thieves. You didn't even try to make it up for the people who lost their OMCs. I guess they can go fuck themselves for using an online wallet proclaimed as the most popular and friendly one back then with "secure protocols". The same exploits which were found in xflat's wallet were found in yours, how do you think that they stole OMC overnight? I was able to withdraw around 6k OMC from your wallet once it happened, that being by amounts of 100 per each withdrawal for some reason, it was dried up in front of your very eyes.

Shit happens. I understand. But when shit happens, people try to face up the consequences this kind of shit had on other people. Hell, traders now don't give a shit because the amount that was stolen back then isn't worth much now. Don't dare compare the AllCrypt theft to what happened in the past, as OMCs were worth so much more.

Hell, the other wallets got hacked way before yours did, that happened with the same exploit and I recall you still being around. That's kind of stupid, that's the exact same kind of shit we warned xflat about and he decided to drop it. Ignorance? Assuredly. Laziness? Maybe. That should teach you to make an online wallet for people to put their OMCs in cold storage (the amount of people who had ZERO experience with actual cryptos with stable value who started dealing with OMC is quite big, they only got into it to get HF-related services). You think that the other owners of wallets didn't have to face the same kind of complaints? They did.

tl;dr don't make wallets that contain hundreds of thousands of OMC if you can't even secure exploits that are in front of you, your ignorance excuse is pure bullshit and even though others might not care, nobody should forget how unreliable you are, not because you ditched us due to bail as nobody gives a shit about the actual owner of the wallet, they care about their funds that got stolen when said exploit could have still been fixed, that's why I'm blaming you

You can keep making shitty excuses covering your lack of knowledge, I'd just like for people to see what happened back then and how unreliable you are

I respect you more than anyone else on this subforum. And with due respect, once the first few online wallets got hacked, the OMC skype chat had immediately started contacting other owners since we had the exploit figured out (Back when Matt, Aceman, Ortek and others were still active), xflat just straight out rejected fixing it (costing him a net $400 btw)

I was comparing the actual value of the amount that was stolen from OMC-Wallet back then, when the value was much, MUCH more stable than it is now. Compared to the precedent value OMCs had, you can't compare the two with the fluctuation of rates.

I know OMC prices are increasing, this market isn't new to me at all.

He's actually correct. OMC was worth a lot more back then. It decreased a lot, and then started slowly increasing.

I did not take any money from transactions.

I did not ditch anyone. 1. There's nothing I could've done if I was here. 2. It was not possible for me to be here. I did do my best.

1. There was a fee on each transaction. Let's see how good you are at making short and edgy answers that make you seem cool to my long answers. How derogatory.

2. You could have looked into your wallet's security in a deeper way especially when we bloody reported the said exploits to most wallet owners. It's not about being there once the OMCs are gone, rofl. You wouldn't even have done anything back then, and I expect no less as I have already said.

3. You did since you had the whole thing under your nose, literally. You're just making up shit to justify the fact your wallet's backend security was shit.

4. Sure thing you did. I bet that if you keep telling yourself that you might convince yourself.

5. Lol. I can't even start fathoming how idiotic and derogatory this statement is to people who used your wallet. Users counted on your "knowledge" to keep their OMC safe since they didn't even know how to set up an offline wallet. If you think that the previous post was an insult, then you won't mind me calling you blindly stupid for saying it's their fault. I see it as your own fault.

6. le funny meme, damn, you're back from bail but you haven't forgotten how to act like a brat, bravo

7. Perfect

8. You don't care because you wouldn't even have wanted to make it up for people who lost OMCs due to your irresponsibility. And back then the value was pretty common across the forums, more bullshitting around as I see

This is just my opinion, but i feel like the security fail was not Alex's fault. Exploits, when created, dont go directly to the internet, so blaming for that is kinda overkill. It could've been a brand new exploit found at the moment...
