What you misunderstand, no, what nearly all new 'designers' who open a shop like yours don't seem to understand, is that people do not care that much about how cheap it is. It's like me buying peanuts: If I buy cheap peanuts I'll get what I paid for, I'd be looking for good peanuts, cheap and good peanuts are rare.

I am sorry to say this, but your work resembles the work of an amateur. I would work on myself more if I were you.

Not everybody is looking for an A++ job.

Maybe they want something simple, or easy.

You can't judge someone's artwork from 2 things they have done.

Nonetheless, I see what you are saying.

but goodluck.

See it kinda bothers me that you're calling me an amateur when you put desperate guys (like yourself) on some amateur porn star. Nevertheless good luck with your sales

Never did that for myself, and the 'porn stars' made themselves amateurish.

Likewise.

Feel free to continue to go on to every thread and comment about how each user isn't as good as you! Hope it makes you feel better about yourself! Alright, well since you're taking my advice as a hateful statement I'm going to go ahead and explain myself. As I formerly stated I'm tired of seeing members who just recently started to design, open a service that's offering designs that are sub-par. As far as being full of myself, I would hardly even say that I think of myself as a decent designer, even with having nearly five years of experience I still produce work that I myself greatly dislike and junk it. Although I have been designing for years now I think I can say that I know my way around the ropes. If you compare your designs to others who have years of experience, you'll see what I mean when I say that you need to improve. In no way of shape or form am I trying to discourage you of becoming a better designer, I think Hack Forums needs more artists however, I do think you should close your design service as it's greatly insulting the rest of the skilled designers on the marketplace.

If you wanted to give someone constructive criticism you should send them a PM instead of trying to trash their thread because you're better.
