I think your main site needs a little more design work. You don't have equal margin/padding for your sections, and in my opinion the main text in the body is too heavy.

However, I am too designing a coding website. Im not expecting anything to come from it, I'm literally only doing it to keep myself busy whilst Im not studying.

Spoiler \(Click to View\)

But yeah, I started this design early this morning.

Either way, good luck with you site dude

You should go on Shark Tank, that show is great.

Nur0x - September 6, 2014, 6:48 pm

You don't need to buddy.

Honestly, get a decent design sorted for your main site. Then create a basic splash page with email sign ups. Then, just create the first two or three tutorials for each language. So, for myself. Im doing UI/UX Design in Photoshop, HTML, CSS/SASS/, Javascript, PHP, RoR, Python, iOS Development in Swift, and Android Development.

I've been making tutorials for about 3 months now, but I only have around 3 for each language. Once I launch the site, Ill post all the tutorials. After that, I'll see what's the most popular and see where the traffic is going.

It's just about having a good market plan bro, it's all about quality not quantity. Aim for decent quality videos. There's nothing worse than a 10 min video that explains jack shit, each video only needs to be about 3/5 minutes. You just need to split them down in to good functioning segments etc

That's just C++ with Microsoft extensions so that programmers can write code for the .net framework. And it's not even called C++ it's called C++/CLI.

So you need to change the name to C++/CLI which would mean you have no C++ section.
