Thread: Hackers demand Sony remove all signs The Interview existed or more data will be relea

See this is exactly the kind of shit that happens when you cave to a terrorist hacker group. Sony's pulling of the movie has validated their actions and now they think they can make even more demands:

<http://www.theverge.com/2014/12/19/7421373/sony-hackers-wont-release-more-data-because-the-interview-cancelled>

Funny how they are no longer threatening physical attacks. They're incapable of that. They only know how to hack Sony's weak security.

These hackers have the shittiest broken english and these theatre chains think North Korea has sleeper cells? Lol give me a break.

hmm Barrack Obama claims they will respond to this im interested to know how lol

Narrate - December 19, 2014, 1:17 pm

FUCKKKK They said they have no plans of making the movie public now.

Not necessarily:

Lets hope sony keeps its word about a possible alternate release.

I will go make a petition to ask the major movie theaters screen it.

North Korea doesn't have internet so shutting it down will only bother one part of government. Rest of their communication is local.

C'mon just nuke pyongyang Obama. We're all ready

I do hope a release is still prominent. I've heard rumours of BitTorrent putting their word in to Sony, saying that they could serve it.

I too, hope that the US retaliates, NK has no right to do what they did.

I'm actually very interested to see what Obamas "proportional" reaction is. That word has such implications LOL
