If you don't show any code, the possibilities of where the error is coming from are too big.

If the user is experienced enough to fix your crypter errors, why not just make their own crypter instead of getting a free stub from yours?

Took it straight from my FAQ thread. You should read this little advice before pressing the submit button:

Quote:Be sure to be as complete as possible with your post, providing us with full details about the situation or problem. This includes for instance information about:

The source code you are working with.

The error message(s) you are getting.

The location in your code where the problem occurs.

The things you have tried already.

Possibly web pages you've been reading to get to your solution. Simply saying "I've used google but didn't got any good results." won't suffice.

Compile errors or runtime? How are we expected do help if you're being this vague?
