Anyone read that from last month?

Doesn't shock me at all. Some of the biggest trolls who are banned from HF I completely believe have personality disorders.

The article also seems to say it's about 5% of online users who identify themselves as trolls. Maybe at HF we have a higher percentage than that but even worse the trolls can be very vocal and make it appear as though they are a larger group than they really are.

One thing I really wonder is if trolls know they have a problem or do they believe they are behaving normally?

Fascinating stuff.

When I troll, It's because I need a laugh so I'm desperate for that one good laugh. so yes I believe it's a condition and most trolls know about it because they have the urge to make themselves laugh till they shit themselves but ya I think we need to see shrinks about that issue.

Shockley - March 19, 2015, 11:13 pm

To answer your question, trolls know they're not behaving normally when they're trolling. If a troll thinks he is behaving normally, I'd say he isn't a troll he's just autistic.

I dont have a personality disorder mate, I am a tier 4 master troll.

Qua - March 19, 2015, 11:13 pm

I think a lot of it is these sheltered heavy internet users are able to express that in trolling. And unlike real life the consequences are super minimal, which just gives them all the more reason to stay online. It makes tons of sense.

Joaquín Guzmán Loera - March 19, 2015, 11:14 pm

I'm pre-sure like 80% of trolls know what they are doing, then you get the weird 20% who actually think what they do is normal. Give or take.

Radar7 - March 19, 2015, 11:14 pm

I actually know a guy from school who trolls a lot online, and when thinking about it he's pretty odd. He can't seem to talk to people without twitching or frantically making a sudden movement.

The trolls that spam gore/porn are the ones you should watch out for. Almost all serial killers are psychopaths with abnormal sexual fantasies and an addiction to watching pornography.

Sociopaths are less able to play along. They make it plain that they're not interested in anyone but themselves. They often blame others and have excuses for their behavior.

Some experts see sociopaths as "hot-headed." They act without thinking how others will be affected.

Psychopaths are more "cold-hearted" and calculating. They carefully plot their moves, and use aggression in a planned-out way to get what they want. If they're after more money or status in the office, for example, they'll make a plan to take out any barriers that stand in the way, even if it's another person's job or reputation.

Just to point it out but Sociopath and Psychopath are actually both just slang for Anti-Social Personality Disorder, they both mean the exact same thing and thus do not have different meanings.

Sociopathy is learned/environmental Psychopathy has genetic origins.

They describe the same disorder, but they have different origins. That is untrue, they are both slang with no actual clear cut definition. In the 20's they called them Psychopaths, in the 40's it was officially changed to Sociopath and so on.

If you were to actually research the two titles you'd find that most sources have intertwined definitions that contradict one another.

While many sources will claim they are different (The most common being that Sociopathic traits are caused by the environment) under the DSM-5 and ICD-10 they are both classified as the same thing.

With that in mind you can feel free to call them whatever you want but with the mass amount of different definitions that sources give for the two it's best to just use the actual personality disorder they originate from.

VRUMM - March 20, 2015, 1:01 am

Psychopath qualities can be found in both trolls and bullies. Most psychopaths are raised in a divorce, and are often neglected / abused as children. I am sure we can get some really cool statistics from hf if we have a poll.

If you noticed, nearly every single serial killer originated from terrible parenting(neglect/abuse) or a divorce.

(Mar 20, 2015 01:18 AM)Panik Wrote: [\[CITE\]](#) Sociopaths tend to be nervous and easily agitated. They are volatile and prone to emotional outbursts, including fits of rage. They are likely to be uneducated and live on the fringes of society, unable to hold down a steady job or stay in one place for very long. It is difficult but not impossible for sociopaths to form attachments with others. Many sociopaths are able to form an attachment to a particular individual or group, although they have no regard for society in general or its rules. In the eyes of others, sociopaths will appear to be very disturbed. Any crimes committed by a sociopath, including murder, will tend to be haphazard, disorganized and spontaneous rather than planned.

Psychopaths, on the other hand, are unable to form emotional attachments or feel real empathy with others, although they often have disarming or even charming personalities. Psychopaths are very manipulative and can easily gain people's trust. They learn to mimic emotions, despite their inability to actually feel them, and will appear normal to unsuspecting people. Psychopaths are often well educated and hold steady jobs. Some are so good at manipulation and mimicry that they have families and other long-term relationships without those around them ever suspecting their true nature. Did you not even read my post? As I earlier stated, people use the terms as slang. But when it comes to an actual medical term they mean the exact same thing.

People give the slang their own definitions (which by default is wrong) but the actual medical terms have no difference.

A euphemism for a person calling someone a Sociopath vs Psychopath and intended medical definitions would be like a Biologist using chemistry terms in the sense of biology.

They obviously have a long list of symptoms that can be defined in being called trolls: Competitive, Deceitful, Narcissistic, Paranoid, Self-blind, Hypocrits, etc, etc.

Roll these all into one, or a select few and you have yourself a troll. You'd find most people will fall under one of these conditions, so at some point every is really a troll.

That being said I believe most trolls do what they do on purpose (Unlike my Sociopath/Psychopath argument where I genuinely didn't mean to start a fight, I just meant to inform people) and they must get something out of it, likely being some sort of joy which in itself is abnormal.

Omniscient - March 20, 2015, 2:24 am

What I get from reading the article is that internet trolls are not just random people online having some fun. Indeed these are real people who have real problems and can in fact be really dangerous.

Just because a troll is behind a keyboard it should not make their actions any less dangerous to the general public.

Maybe eventually better laws will be written about online harassment and behavior. Certainly you could not go into a public establishment and misbehave to the point you make everyone around you mad. The internet should have limits too. And I hate the way that sounds but again...I think the danger from trolls is real. You have kids who commit suicide based on internet bullies and you have attention seekers who commit real crimes and post them on Youtube. That's not innocent behind a keyboard behavior but it becomes surreal to some because they view it online. No one should be accepting this as normal behavior and if you're laughing at cruel behavior then maybe you're part of the problem too.

And in the meanwhile I'm just waiting for this eclipse to happen but I can't see shit because fog lol..

Korzh - March 20, 2015, 2:33 am

While you can easily dismiss online bullying by blocking or banning them from using social sites - though if they persist and create multiple accounts to get around the blocking then you can just go off from the internet. Yes, this isn't the solution, as it the equivalent as just hiding yourself away in real life, but it can reduce the amount of contact from this person if they do not live near the victim.

There should be more strict rules in enforcing punishment to those who troll online, and in the recent years it has improved a lot. I have read in the news a few times that people have been punished for trolling online in the UK, so people are finally waking up and treating this as a real problem.

But just like bullying in person, it can't be avoided and people will still have the same problem with getting help or trying to stop the trolling. If you try to tell anyone that they are being bullied online they will probably just suggest that you stop talking to them or not go online, which isn't the solution. More should be done to stop, but the internet is used by billions so filtering this out is next to impossible. The internet is far more accessible, thus, you will find 100% more problems online.

Anyone read that from last month?

Doesn't shock me at all. Some of the biggest trolls who are banned from HF I completely believe have personality disorders.

The article also seems to say it's about 5% of online users who identify themselves as trolls. Maybe at HF we have a higher percentage than that but even worse the trolls can be very vocal and make it appear as though they are a larger group than they really are.

One thing I really wonder is if trolls know they have a problem or do they believe they are behaving normally?

Fascinating stuff.

I think trolls are unfairly pigeon-holed tbh. I mean, it just always seems to be childish insults and flames that give people the title.

I troll (off-site) a lot, and do so without throwing a single insult. I feel we should just call the flammers 'cock-knockers'. I feel they would do it a lot less then.

Indeed these are real people who have real problems and can in fact be really dangerous.

Just because a troll is behind a keyboard it should not make their actions any less dangerous to the general public.

Maybe eventually better laws will be written about online harassment and behavior. Certainly you could not go into a public establishment and misbehave to the point you make everyone around you mad. The internet should have limits too. And I hate the way that sounds but again...I think the danger from trolls is real. You have kids who commit suicide based on internet bullies and you have attention seekers who commit real crimes and post them on Youtube. That's not innocent behind a keyboard behavior but it becomes surreal to some because they view it online. No one should be accepting this as normal behavior and if you're laughing at cruel behavior then maybe you're part of the problem too.

Grin - March 20, 2015, 11:01 am

I think it depends on the circumstances and I don't necessarily think there is causation between (troll) and (mental disorder), but then again, my psychology teacher told me that 100% of the people who meets with the therapist will be diagnosed with one sort of mental disorder or another at the end of the session. That means all of us suffer from some brain chemistry unbalance of some sort and being a troll doesn't have anything to do with that. However, I might be able to see how they draw the conclusion of having a mental disorder and because of that, relate it to their behaviors online. Trolls moved with culture in the transformation of the digital age and I think that's undoubtedly the biggest correlation between behavior.

...or maybe we're all a little mischievous behind our screens and that's actually normal.

You haven't seen anything in 8 months, in almost 8 years you can count on one hand all of the previous lounge kings.

Trisomy 21 - March 20, 2015, 11:42 am

Quote from article:

Quote:In the study, trolls were identified in a variety of ways. One was by simply asking survey participants what they "enjoyed doing most" when on online comment sites, offering five options: "debating issues that are important to you," "chatting with others," "making new friends," "trolling others," and "other."

I think theres a significant difference between people who answer in a survey that trolling is their favorite activity on the internet, and everybody else who trolls. Anybody who answers trolling is their favorite activity in a survey is either trolling IRL or clearly has some shit wrong in their lives.

True. Just like a true psychopath doesn't go in public and reveal themselves as a psychopath. Not that it's a good thing to be a troll or a psychopath, but most trolls will keep silent about it. It doesn't mean that claiming you're a troll automatically cancels you being a troll, it just means you're doing it all for the attention. Now, I'm sure a lot of trolls do what they do for attention, some do it for the amusement, others do it just to mess with people; I just find it sad that anyone says their favorite hobby is pissing people off on the Internet. To them it's a whole reality, sure; but don't you think your reality should be more than reliant on the feelings of others?

You're buying into their made up game, they feel special when they make people like you reply to their old fag shenanigans because they can't accept that their time is up, and by you acknowledging it, it reaffirms their delusions of superiority.

Great Prosperity - March 20, 2015, 4:56 pm

It kind of depends on what type of trolling. If a person is constantly trolling for the sole purpose of causing emotional distress or inciting chaos then yes they likely have some problems.

But if a person occasionally trolls just for fun, it probably isn't a psychological issue.

Loser Douche Bag #35 - March 20, 2015, 4:56 pm

Omni, trolls are 10 year old children. It's not a personality issue, it's a maturing issue. But then again I've seen people post some really fucked up stuff on here before of cut up bodies and shit. But now some trolls are just straight up for laughs, like those obvious ones.

I agree, in Halo 2 I was barely ever able to level up past 37, and I spent a long time believing that was my fault, even though I knew deep down I was equal to those 50s with the silver halo around their rank who were oppressing me. I mean, I don't really know for sure, his obituary and shit was posted, but those could be easily faked. I recall one member faking a death on HF I think, but I don't remember honestly. People on the thread claimed they were talking to him on Skype a few days after the thread was posted, so I don't know if it was just one big last troll. Either way, I'm still going to go under the assumption that he did kill himself.

Yes he did. And if you read through his threads he confirms his name is the exact one which matches the obituary, confirms relatives names, confirms death of cousin from skydiving, etc. which all match obituary. The only way it's fake is if the obituary from the site is fake which is very, very doubtful.

The best trolls are actually believing whatever they're trolling about.

they know entirely what they are lying about and only do it for a genuine laugh. trolling is basically a cheap form of humor.

the ones with personality disorder may be the best trolls on the internet, because what they're saying is actually true in their own head.

I don't know if anyone would take pity even if he killed himself. His numerous claims of just outright disgusting things would further make you dislike him. Half the time he was trolling, but I couldn't help but wonder if he was slightly serious in even half the shit he posted.

Which is why I'm slightly discontented with anyone that thinks his death (or fake death) was any different from the other users, but because Tate was a troll (and most people under the assumption that every troll has a fucking mental disorder) he's automatically a bad example of a troll in this situation.
