Thread: [\[Informational\] Hey skids, the stickied products of crackers won't help you jack shit](#)

Th3PonyWizard - April 28, 2015, 11:20 pm

Updated version:

1) You're paying 5$ for a site that prints out values from hidemyass and other proxy databases. 5$. Why.

2) Brute force.

3) Probably brute force.

4) Brute force.

5) Brute force.

6) Brute force.

All shit. All crap. Buy one and you're a complete tool.

First thread is brute force

Second thread is something awful. I have no idea what it is, but I trust my senses

Third is brute force

Forth is brute force

Fifth is brute force

(Interestingly enough both Facebook and Twitter have hostname-based protection. The fuck does knowing the password will get you? ABSOLUTELY NOWHERE. People knew one of my passwords, logged on my twitter only to find out they can't because of regional lock.)

Directory attack or not, we're still talking about attempting hundreds of thousands of passwords, possibly millions, to even have a chance at this. It's pure luck by all means, if your target used a real password then you can be sure that you're not getting that account.

Incendiary. - April 28, 2015, 11:51 pm

Good to see someone post the truth ;)

Probably the best way to 'hack' someones account it to infect them, crackers are almost pointless personally unless are using something other than brute forcing.

w34k - April 28, 2015, 11:54 pm

Lol, I feel sorry for people who waste their money on that shit.

"At Twitter, we have a system that issues a login challenge when a suspicious login is detected on Twitter. The user gets prompted with a simple question about their account to verify the attempt is legitimate before granting access. On April 30, we are going to begin implementing this same system across third parties in order to further prevent account compromise.

This change affects third parties that use xAuth (If you are using 3-legged OAuth or Fabric you will not be affected). Once we implement the change, when a suspicious login is detected from your site or app that uses xAuth to authenticate, the user will not be able to log in and will receive an email from Twitter with a temporary passcode, which they will need to enter in order to log in to continue using your service. API error code 329 is what you'll see when a suspicious login is detected from one of your users."

Mostly all services require a security question to be answered if you sign in from an unknown location. Even if you did crack the account, you'd still be locked out.

People are more aware on having stronger passwords these days but i feel that it could be a use for it when going for spesific targets that could be a victim of spesific targeting Honestly, I don't see why people don't use SentryMBA. It's FREE and no one has seemed to have made anything better.

Demoralise - April 30, 2015, 3:44 am

I actually find cracking to be very effective with patience, you just have to be good at it. I have gotten a few accounts through password cracking.

Crackers are good attempting to crack lists worth of emails... for example 1000+. For a single account, not a hope in hell.

Tbh I imported my 2000 FB friends to Yahoo, got their emails and turned them into an email list. Then I created a combo with the emails and the rockyou password list. Only got around 5 accounts, but not too bad.

There was slight targeting: People that were or still are my friend of Facebook.

Sometimes if the flaw is good enough you don't even need proxies.

Also, it's possible to info crack the names easily if you exploit security vulnerabilities in some situations.

Ultimately OP is right though. Those posts look like total junk and I feel kinda sorry for the noobs that waste their money on um.

The only time brute forcing is even worth it is if you're trying to crack multiple names and accounts. Not just one target. If you have a specific target it's much easier to just gain information on them or DOX them and then crack their stuff via security questions and/or social engineering.

Nomad.Null - June 4, 2015, 7:47 am

Still deserves front-page status. Learn to build your own tools, and forget bruteforcers. That's all these tools are. In this day and age, bruteforce gets you nowhere. Dictionary attack...maybe...but this is the 21st century. Users are getting smarter and know not to make passwords less than 8 characters. Learn hacking the right way...learn exploitation.

farux - June 7, 2015, 2:50 am

All of that crap does sound enticing to a new member and someone who is just starting in the field. However, like most things, if it is too good to be true it is usually is and most likely you are just going to get screwed over. People need to learn to not take the easy way out all the time- instant gratification is a bad obsession that can lead to stupid outcomes. If they put in the time and work, they wouldn't be so desperate for these kind of "services".

Hinch - June 7, 2015, 2:53 am

I'm sure if someone wasn't a skid and wanted to get someone's password you could either rob their house or beat them up for it. Or take the easier route and reverse proxy them when logging in

?pth?n - June 7, 2015, 3:12 am

Foreseeable - June 7, 2015, 8:32 am

I 100% agree with this.

They are just brute forcing an account.

If I wanted there account, I'd just rat them and or key log them.

farux - June 7, 2015, 8:39 am haha yea if people just continued to learn the trade, they would come across what, when and how to brute force in almost every beginner "hacking" tutorial and know that this is not something that they need to purchase. Take the time to do some research unknown321 - June 7, 2015, 8:42 am also those bruteforcers never come with a proxy list and all of them are banned on those websites so the program never works right anyway. Where the hell do you plan on getting 10 thousand private proxies from. Last i checked thats non existant.

Great thread. Hopefully everyone reads this before buying them and getting there hopes up.

People need to realise they can't buy such tools and expect to crack a like twitter.com/god or something.

These tools are just like SentryMBA. You can't just type in a username and expect it to crack it.

These sellers are falsely advertising and taking advantage of newbies just like the "make 6000$ a day" ebooks do.

Directory attack or not, we're still talking about attempting hundreds of thousands of passwords, possibly millions, to even have a chance at this. It's pure luck by all means, if your target used a real password then you can be sure that you're not getting that account.

Code Hi Yuval,

We noticed that someone recently tried to sign in to your Twitter account (@Th3PonyWizard) from an unusual device or location.

If this wasn't you, change your password now: https://twitter.com/account/begin_password_reset

If this was you, confirm your identity by using this temporary code: xxxxxx

You can also enter this code where you would normally enter your password when you sign in.

Once you confirm your identity, you can continue using your current password.

If you're having trouble, you can report a problem.

Thank you,

I'm contemplating releasing these BruteForcers for free. Just because of the fact that these products are so simple and so shitty that they aren't even worth $5

It might be ironic that I support a cracker myself, but there's a reason I didn't put "Targeted" or "Dictionary" attacks, which are inaccurate as hell. Combo attacks are the only ones that turn out to be efficient, once combolists are scraped from private databases, you even have chance at hitting goldmines.

That's correct. If that's what hacking was, I'm sure everyone can be called a "hacker". ?
But no. TRUE hacking requires a lot more from you than you think.

Directory attack or not, we're still talking about attempting hundreds of thousands of passwords, possibly millions, to even have a chance at this. It's pure luck by all means, if your target used a real password then you can be sure that you're not getting that account.

Probably the best way to 'hack' someones account it to infect them, crackers are almost pointless personally unless are using something other than brute forcing.

The only successful hacking attempt I have ever done was when I used Havij Pro SQL Injector to infect a website and flood it, then delete all the accounts on it, and then proceed to destroy the rest of the website. This isn't even necessarily hacking, it's more like... infecting. But the people who buy these things can only be described with 3 words: poser wanna-be screw-ups.

Brute forcing will never be effective again unless quantum computers become more than just a theoretical concept. Instead, you should look into password attacks via dictionaries and pre-hashed rainbow-tables IF you have the proper know-how to do it properly.
