The Swat Team is knocking on your door, what will you do?

I would grab my hard drives and gtfo.

what would you do?

Or id probably be dead and cry my self to sleep because if they get called for terrorism and they knock down my door im probably dead

Haggo - October 6, 2015, 8:18 pm

Let them in... I've got nothing to hide lol.

Jesse Pinkman - October 6, 2015, 8:18 pm

I open the door and ask whats up, and let them do / search whatever they want cause I've got nothing to hide.

They'd most likely have to surrounded. I wonder what you keep on your hard drives.

JuiceWater - October 6, 2015, 8:19 pm

Same thing for me. I haven't committed any crimes but I've looked up so much shady shit I'd probably be put on FBI watch list.

I'd chill with them and let them tear up whatever they want, theres nothing noteworthy for them to find here.

The OG FurFag ? - October 6, 2015, 8:23 pm

Run directly at them getting myself killed. Easy enough. I'd ruin it for them. Plus, I've got no reason to be alive if the FBI shows up.

Thats s freken smart lol. if i had a basement id probably make a nother little base ment under it to hide

occupi - October 6, 2015, 8:27 pm

I'd run that new crypto malware that randomly encrypts all your shit with a newly generated key per file and then deletes the key when it's done. Goodnight, sweet prince.

The OG FurFag ? - October 6, 2015, 8:28 pm

The FBI would never be at my house anyway. I use incognito mode ;)

Burakku Kenshi - October 6, 2015, 8:29 pm

Jokes on you, I live in a tent deep in the woods in the middle of butt fuck nowhere. Good luck SWAT!

Seriously though if I had my desktop right now i'd take a pic because I have a setup already prepped for a situation like that. I have 4 1tb hard drives in a small custom made case just big enough for them to fit in there nice and snug and holes that are just barely big enough for the wires to fit through. If the SWAT or FBI were knocking on my door I would just pick up my hard drive case thingy and throw it deep into the air vent in my room. Like shove my arm all the way in there and throw it around the corner. Getting it back out would be a different story but hopefully they don't go looking in there.

?????™ - October 6, 2015, 8:29 pm

I would very calmly open the door.

I've done nothing to send the swat team to my house lol.

Yea, too bad if the FBI really wanted to get into it they would run that encryption by a supercomputer.

It's only a matter of time before all encryption algorithms are cracked.

iHeal - October 6, 2015, 8:35 pm

I'd just open it. I don't have much to hide and if I was being swatted they would probably be looking for a real crime, not search my pc for cracked accounts.

Not worth their time, I'm not that important. Besides, the encrypted harddrive is the red herring. ;)

Edit: I also realized that they'd have to crack each and every file separately (new key per file) so... good luck finding anything incriminating in the millions of files worth of normal shit I do on here day to day.

Turn off my PC, hard drives are encrypted. Take out RAM and ensure there's no feasible forensic method of recovering the decryption key. Not saying I do (at all), but some people have pirated movies on their hard drives that they don't need anyone finding. Same goes for software. PC turns off in 4 seconds or less, so I'm covered there.

I'd assume his hard drive is encrypted and the file in question corrupts the bootloader, making it much more likely that any forensics professional will assume the entire hard drive is fucked; generally full-drive encryption software bootloaders give an idea what type of hashes and algos are used to decrypt the device, but without that it'd be extremely difficult to just take a guess. Especially with new FDE software that includes PIM; with that in place, a brute-force attack becomes nearly impossible.

I have the same set-up. It runs as administrator, changes the bootfile to a simple error including a picture of a dead smiley face with its tongue out (in spoiler below). Kind of a "fuck you" before having to go through the whole process at the police station, except with complete plausible deniability.

Then again, his Bitcoin address has literally 0 BTC in it, so something tells me he didn't go to the trouble to write something sophisticated like that, and that he also has no realistic need to do such a thing.

The only time SWAT would use anything near 7.62 is for sniping purposes (usually .243 or .308). And we're not talking about "depending on their current mission", we're talking about them arriving at some kids house to recover his harddrive and arrest him, which would be no reason to use anything chambered in 7.62.

Well, if they are kind enough to knock on my door, then I would answer it. But most likely a swat team won't be leisurely knocking on my door. They'll be using a battering ram to knock it down.

The only time SWAT would use anything near 7.62 is for sniping purposes (usually .243 or .308).
And we're not talking about "depending on their current mission", we're talking about them arriving at some kids house to recover his harddrive and arrest him, which would be no reason to use anything chambered in 7.62.

If a SWAT team actually shows up to my house, I'll assume I've been swatted by someone at school as a prank for some reason or another. I see no reason I'd legitimately have a SWAT team show up to my house - I have never done anything illegal, and the only hacking I have done was into my own devices and devices I was authorized to hack into.

I'd probably just try to find who did the swatting...

Tampering with evidence/destroying evidence would be your charges. Since you are obviously trying to hide something from them, and they were raiding you for that reason. It would all be hearsay, but it's the Government they can do whatever the hell they feel like.
