[\[TUTORIAL\] REAL ESTATE + BOLD LETTER + ZERO WORK = \$X,XXX/month | LETS DO THIS! \[NEW\]](#)

I haven't posted a thread in this section in a while so I thought i'd share something new for you action takers to try out.

This is not 100% my original method it's my own twist on something I read a while back.

STEP 1 - Prospecting Clients

In this specific example I am going to be using real estate however you can do this with pretty much any businesses (i'd recommend staying away from restaurants).

What we need to do is find a business with horrible yelp reviews and potentially horrible reviews from other sites (Google included)

In this example I've found a group of realtors with a horrid reputation for renting out condos.

We will be offering up a service to fix their reputation online.

(Stick with me I will go into the details of how we will be doing this later on)

STEP 2 - Bold, Confident, To The Point Letter

We will be writing a hard copy letter (much higher converting than an email) and we will be employing a bold and attention grabbing tactic.

I've come up with a fake business name and logo to make myself look more legitimate:

Script for you to edit and use:

Quote: Dear THEIRNAMEHERE,

The keys in this envelope or the ones you could have handed over to the buyer of a new home that you just sold. However, it's not. Why? Because your potential clients are not even considering you as their retaliator! This is because upon searching your company on Google a storm of negative and slanderous reviews about your company pop up. You can leave your entire business to chance and hope that people don't search for you online or you can take matters into your own hands and allow us to help you fix this.

I've attached just a few of the results that come up when searching your company on Google. These reviews of your company seem to be outrageous making claims about your company's morals and integrity!

At Fox Securities we understand that is certainly not how you want to be perceived. Whether this spike of negative reputation has come from a negative experience or your competitors you should not have to settle for having your name forever tainted. Let's work together, we can remove those harmful reviews from the search and for the ones we can't remove we can bury them 40 pages deep in Google! We can also get your positive reviews dominating the first two pages. Don't leave your business to chance; let's take control of your reputation.

Sincerely,

YOURNAMEHERE

Next, attach a page where you've pasted some of their negative reviews and highlight the important terms in red

No that's not my number and no I did not contact this particular business (it's an example for you guys ?)

Next, we will add the magic touch. Unique and bold items.

A key and a $1 scratcher lottery card!

Remember in this first line of the letter I wrote "these are the keys you could have given to a buyer on a house you sold"

I also am selling the point "don't leave your business to chance and hope people don't search for you online"

These items make your prospective client spend more time thinking about your letter. They are also much more likely to open it when they feel things moving around in the envelope. They will more than likely play the scratcher and during that time they will be thinking about their business and how you can save it!

TIPS: You can get the keys for free at your local hardware store. Just ask for miscut keys and they will give you as many as you'd like FREE. As for the scratcher I'd highly recommend it, however if you don't want to for some reason I've seen others use dice, custom business logo poker chips, etc..

The Finished Product

Tri-fold your 2 papers and put your key and scratcher in the front like so:

What To Do Next...Well actually before!

Yeah.. my thoughts are all over the place. However, before sending out any letters you need to build your list of providers. That's right you will not be doing any work beyond getting clients. You're the middleman. You'll utilize other professional services and charge the client 10-50% more.

What I HIGHLY recommend doing is spending a few days contacting a bunch of companies. Simply google "Online Reputation Management" get in contact with a bunch of companies and find the ones that are the best priced and seem the most professional. Rank them in a list of your top 5. Then when the client decides to work with you the price you will quote them is however much you decide to charge on top of what you need to pay the other company.

Take this step very seriously!

Go as far as Skype calling or phone calling. Make sure your list of service providers are top notch and well priced.

How To Make Yourself An Expert In 24 Hours

So you might be thinking. "Yous.. I know nothing about online reputation management, what do I do if a potential client calls me with questions?"

No worries random voice I created on my own thread. The answer is simple!

BrandYourself.com

This site is awesome. It's entirely dedicated to online reputation management with free and paid tools. You can sign up for free and use their tools and instantly you'll get back a specific plan of action for bettering your own name's reputation. The site is also loaded with free articles that will be you an expert within hours.

Even with a free account upon clicking the 'Help' Tab you'll learn so much about online reputation management. They even have free videos!

Spend a few hours playing with the tools and reading all the help tutorials on there and you'll be sound like you've been doing this for years when answering client questions!

Pricing & Concluding Tips

These services can easily go into the $1000's per client. Start off with very small and easy to fix reputations. Get yourself comfortable with the system and develop awesome relationships with your providers.

As I said earlier avoid restaurants and garages, you won't to focus more on wealthier clients. Dentists, Doctors, Real Estate Agents, Lawyers. It's very justifiable for them to pay you $1500-$3000+ to fix their firms reputation.

If your service provider quotes $1000 you tell your client you can do it for $1500 you keep the $500! Imagine the possibilities here. Even if you only manage to get 10 clients per month say hello to $5000/month for sending out letters to people! Remember these are also high converting letters.

Feel free to reply with any questions you may have. Hope you guys found this one helpful ?

(Only action takers will benefit from this thread)

Pretty nice. Do you think it would go over better if I asked one of the reputation management companies if I could get a commission on every sale I got them?

That is a option and it's a much safer one to start out with. You can absolutely do that if you'd like however some companies don't like being paid less (giving you your cut). Which is why billing the client the providers full price on top of your own designated cut allows you to make more and negotiate terms with your client.

I once thought the same. That I never needed to pay for any guidance (my personality is very lone wolf). Paying for guidance is never a bad investment. Whether it be in dating, finances, business mentoring, guidance is never a bad investment. The reason why it has such a bad reputation is because of the people falling for 'get rich quick schemes' spending money on poorly made products designed by people looking to make money selling ebooks.

Start with books. It changed my life.

I looked through a couple reputation management companies and a LOT of them are a scam, <http://www.vjginteractive.com/> was the first one I found without anything on ripoffreport, pissedoffcustomer, etc. Will be asking about commission work tomorrow to see what they say.

Don't take this personally I just wanted to address this. I hear this all the time. The problem is most people think they need to reinvent the wheel to succeed.

It's so much simpler than you think. Find the people succeeding at anything and find a way to do it better. The work in any business that has already been done before is more than likely documented for free online.

Don't (not you personally everyone) get sucked into the horrible trap of powering through tons of ebooks and courses continuing to find something new. Even the sellers of such products think they have to make something new every time.

Why not just do what you know works and do it better than everyone else? And trust me 'everyone else' can most of the time easily be outworked.

Oh I think you got me wrong. I just wanted to point out to the fact that this reputation management thing isn't new itself so that people don't think of e-mailing them (I've been doing this like one year ago and it was a waste of time) because they think it might be an easier (and free) way to do this.

Sure, you took this thing and added this nice personal letter thing to it, which requires more work but, as I assume, at least a 20 times higher chance of getting into negotiation. Depending on what you write even more I guess. I thought of calling them, which I guess would be somewhere between mailing and sending a letter in the sense of effectivity.

I love the idea of the lotto ticket! Very creative. Once you get a good list of people who bought the service and were happy, another good idea would be to contact these people in the future and offer them services to create a website for them if they don't already have one. The reason I say this is because if they take up your offer on the reviews, that means they actually care about their online reputation a little bit. And are willing to spend money to improve it. You can charge 300-1,000 depending on the quality of your coding/designing skills for a nice website. So much potential. Great tutorial OP I have nothing negative to say about this. I'm sure people who actually get up and put the effort into this will be making very generous amounts of money!

This is incredibly risky. I'm not 100% sure but I recently read that either yelp or maybe amazon or even ebay I forgot but they are suing thousands of sellers for fake reviews bought from fiverr and suspending them from their sites.

Personally I feel it's easier if you tell them that you will be bringing them in clients. But for the client make it sound like it's you and your (employees, or company) .

To do that make sure you are the middleman for information. Don't directly hand over the client. This will allow you to successful charge your proper takeaway.

I have a pretty big question.

By your handwriting and the website you are on I can tell you are a teen/young adult, as are most people on this website including myself.

My question is, how do you go to a company and tell them you work for a reputation service then ask them to write a ~$1,400 check in your real name?

I don't see how a company would pay you before the process is completed, because let's be honest, no one here as the $$$ to pay for a $1.5k service then get payed back afterwards.

I don't see how a company would pay you before the process is completed, because let's be honest, no one here as the $$$ to pay for a $1.5k service then get payed back afterwards. If that is your concern you can then just make a deal and offer to bring in leads to already existing companies. That way your name does not need to be involved.

Payment is always due before the service. That's how almost most online services work. It's perfectly acceptable to ask for payment prior to doing service.

This becomes easier to do with better sales skills and presentation of your knowledge on the subject.

Well thats not true.

However, you can't expect everything upfront, thats true (at least as long as you don't have a serious and serious looking page or a real company). Almost any real business will ask for your business information as well so that they can calculate VAT (Value Added Tax).

Great post, currently working on putting it into action with a few twist of my own :) Just some things I am curious about though. What is the reason you don't recommend restaurants? And how do you find businesses with bad reviews specifically? I tried checking Yelp but I couldn't find any way to order it by rating or search for bad ratings. Also do you mail the letters or physically deliver them?

Actually having quite a hard time finding keys for this, I called ~20 locksmiths and hardware stores.

Many said they don't have any, but most said they do but they recycle them or take them to the salvage yard. I asked if they were willing to sell them to me when they said that but was still declined :/

EDIT: I managed to find a site here that sells uncut keys for very cheap. So I guess I can try that.

I've used this in the past to bring aboard some digital marketing clients, mainly online reputation management (ORM) clients. The thing to remember is these clients pay monthly. It's a good way of bringing aboard clients.

Yeah it's usually a flat rate. But you can set different rates depending on the severity of the clients reputation damage. You then bill monthly to maintain and monitor/implement strategies to help them build their reputation naturally.

The quickest way to prove legitimacy is.

1. Clean graphics
2. Verified business paypal with a business name

Use paypal invoices for payment

You can try e-mails but you will usually hit a support agent (gatekeeper) rather than a person in charge of making decisions.

Great copy and concept. Reminds of one of the copywriting greats who included a $1 bill with his letters.

Wouldn't the company with a bad reputation want to see how you helped change others reputation or atleast some kind of proof before chucking over a few grand to some guy they don't even know?
