Well it's true.

Made to last:

I have no intentions of making money off the forum, because money isn't an issue.

Unique:

We have a unique theme and unique features/plugins, with new features coming regularly (I'm aiming for at least one a week).

They look similar because the userbars were designed by someone that does userbars for a lot of forums. To say they look exactly the same would only be accurate if you were blind.

And saying the avatars look the same because they're circle is utterly ridiculous lmao.

All parts of the theme are original.

The new owner has said this in the Changelog of 13/8/2016

Quote:Feature schedule. Originally Eternal ran on a "feature-per-week" schedule, where a feature was released weekly. For those who don't know, I'm still a student in high school, so I will be bringing a schedule back eventually, but not a weekly schedule. The reason for this is because creating features and releasing them as well as preparations for said features in a single week is insanity.

ok:

- Anonymous Posting - You can choose to reply to any thread/create a thread anonymously. Unlike the anonymous "section" on some forums, this is site-wide and is truly anonymous - with no way for a regular user to see who posted.

- Username holding - Your old usernames get held for one month; and anyone can change their username twice per month.

- Saging/Do not bump - By ticking a checkbox, you can choose to not bump a thread when you reply to it.
- Youtube Lazyloading - to keep page load times down, youtube videos are loaded as you scroll down the page. apparently this was such a good feature that other forums started copying it.
- Image Albums - While not strictly unique; Eternal's implementation is unique.

will you stop being a tryhard now?

Thanks, and I wasn't tryharding. 70% of the thread's title is 'Unique features' in your face. Seems like a pretty fundamental part of the advertising and getting people to sign up. I just didn't understand anyone could use that claim without also simply backing up that claim, by presenting people with the list of features, without having people to dig deep to find it, it's the damn advertising.

The site was stagnant for a few months while I was recovering from some IRL issues, so I ended up handing it over to a good friend; and that friend wants to continue the 1 unique feature per week where I left off.

I am sorry to be the Debbie Downer, but I am not a fan. For a number of small reasons, that - when combined - just makes everything feel a little bit "off". Here we go:

The gradients are a pain. They make everything look incredibly compressed. I understand wanting to make content "pop out", but does every forum, every title, every box have to look like a button and have a shine? Less is more, remember.

The fonts are very small, bordering on unreadable, particularly on a mobile device. This contributes to everything looking compressed, again. Everything is just very pulled together on the vertical spectrum. Space things out a little, add a few pixels to your font size, and add some padding to all those boxes, so the text gets some air to breathe.

Everything is dark. So dark. It is like getting lulled to sleep visually. There are no bright colors at all that make anything pop. The one thing that makes HackForums' dark (and not very pretty) color scheme work, is that the purple is bright enough to pop out of the grey. You don't have that on your site. Look what happens if I brighten the purples just a little, and make the text white, so it isn't nearly unreadable. Read about color contrasting here (not my website).

Is there really still not an easier registration screen for forum software? Why not just some smooth, simple ajax with 3 boxes? Here's an example.

With just a few changes, I think your site could be great. Right now though, I'm missing the appeal. Hope it helps!

I would recommend doing this as Top Hat suggested.

What i like to point out is optimization. Using a craptop i borrow for reasons, the site is really slow. Scrolling down is a pain in the ass with this where HF for example works fine.

Pretty much all of that is already fixed in the v2 of the site, according to Sweets (the owner).
