I don't think that is really doable, considering that it has never been seen earlier. I believe cookies are protected perhaps browser itself would not allow a cookie to be used on a different domain.

People would still fall to it tho, you would be surprised on how many would not notice.

Im surprised that he is doing it again with the new domain. he will get caught soon lol.

To all of you wondering how the ad got through adsense. There is a seller on # selling something that "masks" the ad or something like that. He was selling it for a very large sum of money though. I saw it a long time ago so i cant remember any specific details.

I don't snitch on dealers, I don't snitch on hackers, but I will snitch on thieves. Fuck those guys. If anyone finds more domains of theirs, find out the domain's Registrar and just send an email to their Legal or Abuse department using a similar email as the one I sent. You can get domains quickly suspended this way. NameCheap suspended both domains within 2 hours of my report.

Anarchist07 - June 6, 2016, 1:17 pm

Pretty sure Google wouldn't allow that, it must be an adware or something because I didn't see any phishing page when I entered Blockchain into Google.

Yeah, I sent a report to NameCheap legal department and I got both of their domains suspended last night. Since the domains don't resolve, Google most likely automatically took them off their ad network, or they manually removed themselves as they'd be spending money for Google ad clicks on a domain that doesn't resolve to an IP.

SIM-2306826 - June 6, 2016, 1:48 pm

Its not adware. everyone gets this. as i saw people say on here. he managed to sneak through google adsense and made his site no.1 on the search term "blockchain". it seems to be dealt with but he will continue to do this.

I did some more research. The page below shows some domains registered by the person. This page may be able to be used to stay updated with new domains that they register.

<https://domlab.net/search/The%20Pantr.html>

Note: some of the domains on that list may be owned by innocent people if 'The Pantr' user is someone who managed domains for multiple clients (including our phisher).

edit: the domains on that page are registered with CrazyDomains. I went ahead and reported all of the domains to them, so as long as they're compliant/ethical the domains will be offline within 24 hours.

Also the reason I'm having the domains suspended (got 2 of them susp'd last night) is because eventually he'll run out of viable domains to use as there won't be any good typo domains available anymore to him... So if I (and anyone who wants to help) can get his domains suspended, he'll go away or at least be mildly annoyed.

The only reason why he doesn't change it up where i can think if is that google doesnt detect it that way, maybe thats why it fools adsense
