Thread: vDOS Owners Arrested in Israel

SUI-3183372 - September 10, 2016, 5:00 pm

Owners of DDoS Service vDOS, M30w and Apple J4ck, have been arrested and released on bond in Israel. The arrests took place on September 9th, as a part of an ongoing FBI investigation. They are ordered to not touch a computer or telecommunication device for 30 days, and are to remain on house arrest.

This likely concludes what was turning out to be an interesting string of events after Brian Krebs released the attack logs from April 2016 to August 2016 of all customers using the vDOS website. Initially after the attack logs were released, vDOS retaliated against Krebs launching a fairly large DDoS attack against his website. They additionally claimed responsibility on an attack against BackConnect Security, which ultimately backfired immensely when BackConnect Security performed a BGP Hijack against vDOS' network and took control of vDOS' internet addresses sometime on Friday. One has to wonder if any of the vDOS customers will be visited by law enforcement, but my money would be on it being unlikely.

Roughly 1,500 customer's used vDOS from April 2016 to August 2016, a list of those users can be seen here:

You are released on bond prior to being sentenced. Essentially, if you are not considered to be a risk to the public or a risk of fleeing the country, the court can release you on bond, allowing you to remain at home until you are sentenced.

This punishment is only for their time before trial/sentencing. Once they are sentenced they may be hit with prison time, monetary restitution, among other things.

thats the punish in our country.

30day no tele and house arrest , they will not put them on jail for it .

but they also will open them a criminal record that will Affecting them to be hired and the army .

In America, I'd expect 6-12 months prison time and monetary restitution. They're young, so the book isn't going to be thrown at them. But they knowingly and willingly broke the law, so some sort of punishment is to be expected.

I have no idea how strict the justice system is in Israel though. Nor do I know if any other country will attempt to extradite them. This was a part of an FBI investigation. Maybe we'll see them in the US in the near future.

i dont know exact but i can tell you some since im from there and learn something.

they will get a criminal record + house arrest .

They should care about the criminal record .

Businesses do not get them to work and they can not join the army . (i mean they can but Chances are very low)

(Israel is the land of conscription)

For cyber shit on israel you will never go to jail , maybe for 1day (night) and then they will release you with a warn / criminal record.

just if you like stealing cc and all that stealing money / items shit you gonna go to jail.

Do you think they could get extradited if another country, say America, attempted to do so? I know Israel and American relations are at an all time low, but we're still close allies. I could imagine Israel extraditing to maintain good relations.

I just search HF and saw Mr Robot's thread being closed by Omni, essentially stating the drama was done and it isn't necessary to speculate on what may or may not happen.

However, that was just regarding the attack logs being released. Now that arrests have been made, I think things may be different? It's no longer people speculating and causing drama, it's a discussion on a string of events that has just happened.

Who knows though, maybe he doesn't want us talking about this either. In which case, I have no argument over him closing the thread if he feels it's necessary.

It's not a muslim country.. it's a civilized state.

I guess here starts the downfall of the booters.. this gets quite a media attention right now.. Wouldn't be surprised if they become more targeted now since majority of the attacks come from them.

Would be about the time too. Maybe we don't need a DDoS protection in 5 years.. who knows? xD

As for those who are on the list, 1500 people are quite a lot to raid.. but on the other hand those logs are very detailed so trouble may arise even months later to those affected..

I can't imagine why they would even keep such detailed logs other than double cross their users in times of need lol.

At least they didn't take paypal.. would be twice as worse right now for the affected. Now that hes arrested, I wonder if they will hand over full database dumps to potentially identify users/targets that were not in that leaked list linked by krebs?

There have been a number of booter operators arrested since 2014. Two were loosely involved in the Blackshades case so I can a bit of inside knowledge on them. I don't think it's some sort of new trend that's going to start. I just think once people hit the spotlight, they get picked off.

In my case all the relevant money was 2-4 years old, and when negotiating with the FBI and the Federal Prosecutor, there was very little hard data to base claims off of. They wanted me to take the hit for a good majority of the sales Blackshades made during my time there, so they wanted me to admit to gaining over $150,000, in which case I'd have a $150,000 restitution and a harsher sentence. I was trying to argue that there was no proof of me gaining that much, and I was using the evidence available to try to take that number below $10,000. We spent a lot of time arguing this point, as it could significantly raise or lower my sentence.

However in this case, even if they can't find the money, everything is recent enough to show how much was earned. CoinPayments is a US company that keeps records of transactions. Coinbase, same thing. PayPal, Credit Card, obvious. They could have the bitcoins stored on paper, locked in a safe and buried underground, they're still going to get hit for restitution totaling that amount.

The sudden interest stemmed from 2 different factors. As the user I quoted above stated, they both turned 18 and were now considered adults, which makes an arrest much more appealing. They also both hit mainstream media as of a week ago, and once you hit the spotlight like that, law enforcement feels much more pressure to take action. They hate getting questions like "well it's obvious xxxx and yyyy are committing crimes. You know who they are, why haven't you done anything yet?!?!"

Pretty sure they can't arrest the person if they live in countries with No U.S. Extradition Treaty Look at Blackshades. That was a 2.5 year investigation by the FBI. When they were ready to finish it, they reached out to roughly 15 different countries to get cooperation and arrest / visit a vast number of users.

Additionally, Marjinz, a Swedish citizen who fled to Moldova when things got too hot, was the first person ever extradited from Moldova to the United States. Moldova has no extradition treaty with the US, but in this situation Moldova allowed FBI agents to fly into the country, make the arrest, and personally bring Marjinz back to the US. The FBI have reach everywhere.

Honestly, through spending nearly 8 years here now, getting arrested and learning a ton about the legal system and cybercrime, and being able to observe a lot of relevant cases, I can easily say that most of you here are playing with fire. Almost all of the people here involved with sales are selling a product with malicious use intent. A lot of you try to spin it by using special words to make it sound legal or educational, but ultimately you know you're selling it to users who will be using the tool maliciously. You have a "solid Terms of Service?" Doesn't matter at all if you sell it to someone who you know is going to break it. As much as I find malware interesting and plan on creating a career around it, so people creating malware is going to fuel my career, a lot of you are ultimately good people that I wouldn't want to see getting their life fucked up. It's not worth it. Maybe you're small enough to stay under the radar and get lucky, but the FBI does monitor this forum, probably more closely than any of you actually realize (I am not allowed to post proof of this but take my word for it). You're taking a huge risk getting involved in malware, and if you want to ensure a trouble free lifestyle, I'd stop.

People need to start embracing Tor more; surprised that not a single booter is operating from Tor.
Tor can still be traced through and the FBI has several Tor exit node honeypots.

That's not how Tor works in this case. He's referring to hidden services, which you don't use an exit node to access.

<https://www.torproject.org/docs/hidden-services.html.en>

While Hidden Services can be traced, generally it is pretty rare that law enforcement agencies try to attack Tor to get at the service. Usually they use actual police work rather than technological tricks to complete their cases. For example, in most of the hidden services taken down, the webserver themselves were leaking the IP address to begin with, someone ratted them out, the owners publicly bragged on IRC, or tried to advertise their website on the clearnet.

tl;dr your points are incorrect. and while it is possible to deanonymize a hidden service, it's rare that they would go to the lengths to do that when easier alternatives exist.

They should have been ended vDos when they hit that 600k mark, making a million dollar product thats operating illegal is gonna get you found eventually. Any smart person once they hit over 100k would instantly stop the product, sell all spoofed servers and dip.

People need to start embracing Tor more; surprised that not a single booter is operating from Tor. Theoretically stressers are to test your own network against DDoS attacks, therefore there's no need actually to hide yourself as you're not doing anything illegal. The point is that they should ask for website verification before pushing IP attacks, but obviously all booters and stressers on HF are aimed by shutting down websites and networks that you don't own. ?

Codefuser - September 13, 2016, 1:24 am

Strong ToS and whatever.

Stressers are ILLEGAL unless they are ran in a LOCAL NETWORK.

You are hitting all of the ISPs and whatever is between your server and the target. If it is a botnet then it is even more illegal. If you are using amplification/reflection (WP, DNS, etc) then it is extra illegal as you are hitting those sites as well.
