Playing around with photoshop and then this ...thought it was cool.

Eh, I mean it's alright, not bad I guess

I think if this looked more fluid it'd be pretty cool. Looks kind of flat as it is right now. I think the lines coming out across the 'ripples', would've been cool if those were gone.

For some dumb reason I'm reminded of Plankton from an episode of SpongeBob SquarePants.

Pretty good man, so good that I chose the this thread as the place to be my first post on this website. It's a lot different from the trippy stuff I've been exposed to. My friends majoring in art and he loves this kinda stuff so I'mma show it to him.

haha appreciate the feedback, Honestly I was high af, and I can't remember what I did to do this, all I remember is it started off as lightning and then I added a gradient and inverted something, Can't remember what I did between those steps don't really understand what it is, but looks trippy and weird

I feel this man these are the projects where you just follow the creativity and end up with something really cool. Although I would fix the really dark blue spots for example on the left, it will look much more fluid.

When I saw this picture I recalled a memory from my young age, when I saw a cell in biology class;)

I never understood critiquing abstract work, that's just me. Overall it seems like something you ended up getting lost in which is the best part about your piece. It would be a great background element in something like a poster. You feel me? I'd continue to work this style and put hard thought into it; things like composition and fluidity in an abstract piece can tell the difference between randomness and thought.
