Thread: You Can't Avoid Scamming Your Customers

Techius - December 24, 2016, 3:51 am

I'm interested in talking about a dilemma the community often faces, which is about scamming. I intend on using facts to help consolidate an opinion on this topic. I will use the dictionary definition of words to help find a conclusion on such a morally tough question.

What's the definition of a scam?

"A confidence game or other fraudulent scheme, especially for making a quick profit" - <http://www.dictionary.com/browse/scam> eWhoring is indeed a "confidence game." You are convincing men to buy a product that isn't even your property in the eyes of the law. You are often enough fooling men by telling a sob story or telling them that you need money for a new phone in order to get money from them. If you are persistent bullshitter, you will eventually get money from these dudes. They don't realise the truth about what's going on behind the scenes, you play with their confidence and other emotions to the point where they give you a quick profit (another term in that definition).

What the community hates, specifically, are people who commit fraud.

What's the definition of fraud?

"Deliberate deception, trickery, or cheating intended to gain an advantage" - <http://www.thefreedictionary.com/fraud>

We hate people who claim to sell nudes (deliberate deception) to get an advantage (money). If you offer a service, you should give someone a product they request. It's your moral obligation to do such a thing as someone who sells a product. If you commit fraud, you are the definition of someone who should not be eWhoring, but thinking about your life choices and moral compass. I mean, for example, let's say someone offers to mow your lawns for $20, you hand the dude the money, then he says he can't mow the lawns because he doesn't have a lawnmower, you're going to want your money back -- it's the same here with eWhoring, different scenario, same emotion and thoughts.

That's just my opinion on what I think about this whole situation.

A+. Nice Thread!

if a customer is happy and gets what he wants, is it fraud/scam?

LilUziVert - December 24, 2016, 4:36 am your post is way TLDR but i can relate to the title lol, eventually they're going to ask for something you don't have or can't provide them, your best bet if you want to give them what they pay for is to sell by the pic or something, or by the vid, said amount for one vid, if they ask for customs or something you can't do just dip them as many times as you can save their name for another picture pack later on.

J?son - December 24, 2016, 4:37 am isn't that what ewhoring is? scamming your customers? LOL

It's a fraudulent scheme to play as the opposite sex to trick others into giving you items

nah you can give them what they want and have regular customers if you got a good back, you don't gotta scam. When you run outta pics change girls lol

Kashira - December 24, 2016, 6:07 am

I mean sh*t, If they're going to hand me over $30 for something I can't provide then rip lmao =p

Although that pretending to be a different person that you actually are is considered a "fraud" I guess...

Delivering what you promised even if it isn't you, is always better for their feeling, trust & mind of state than scamming them (leaving without delivering).

So why do you say this? We all know that it's "not allowed" because it's "fraud", but you act like it's something new.

Would like to hear the story behind this thread. ?

Although I highly appreciate the effort you took to try to insult me with your opinion regarding this interesting topic, yet I have to inform you that your statement of me being an afro-american without any proof, while using such bad word, isn't increasing the value of your opinion nor your post. ?

Mate i beg you.... Please stop it...

Is it possible that every time you answer you have to whine at bullshits?

Come on mate i'm begging you...

Every response you make is a fucking poem, jesus my cancer is getting worse, too much cringe :(

If the customer gets what he asked for than it is a win win for both.

The Mack - December 24, 2016, 8:32 am

Unless Im getting $500 from a customer, Im most likely scamming him.

aph3x - December 24, 2016, 8:46 am

Ok,so I haven't really read the whole bullshit you wrote up there but I thought why not sharing my opinion about the scamming goes around here.

I've been scammed couple of times from people on HF,the thing is that most of them are basically poor retarded kids who can't stand the temptation even if it's 2$,gods knows why.

Im not one of them in anyway and can ask my customers that dealt with me over HF,my customers always treated the best from my side,even if they are retarded (most times.),whiney(NO ENGLISH ON RDP :((() or even charges back on you.

When a customer charges back on me I first checks what happened,and I've refunded lots of users just cuz I felt that it's not worth my time and they probably right. (making sure that they do ofc.)

In that way,I've reached a good rep on PayPal (which is not visible.) so when I need to win a case,PayPal just lets me,because they believe that I actually right since I've refunds customers when needed without needing their involvement (PayPal's).

Bottom line,treat your customers the same way you want to be treated when buying stuff over HF,make them happy with what they bought and if they not,just offer a refund,that's how I do it and it's works like a charm,you might have 2 shitty customers out of 10,but the rest 8 of tgen will love dealing with you and shall come back.

DOnt scam motherfuckers! :S

Wakka - December 24, 2016, 11:14 am

The difference is whether or not they know they are being scammed.

Thanks! I still would consider it a scam with the definition I posted. A fraud? No. I'm just going by the logic of the definitions if you're interested as to how I answer this.

I think by the definition I posted of "scam" you do scam them, but you don't defraud them which is a negative for the community.

The only way you can't "scam" using my definition is by using your own nudes and doing what the guy says.

I suppose. I understand where you're coming from. Nobody would buy if they knew you were a bloke.

If you deliver the "things" as promised after getting paid, then technically you are not scamming your customers.

But I do accept the fact that we are "fraud" because we are pretending to be someone who we are not.

Yep, you agree with the analysis I made then :)

Concussive - February 11, 2017, 12:22 am

This is very true ewhoring is arguably immoral as a general statement however if you deliver the product that your "customer" is asking for then you definitely aren't disappointing anyone nor are you committing fraud or scamming anyone, When i ewhore i never ever scam people because when it comes down to it anyone who is down to pay once is definitely going to pay a second time or even more times, and that is way more profitable then trying to scam someone out of a small amount just once.

E-whoring is a legit business in my eyes, as long as you can deliver what you charge your costumers for ?
