Thread: Ultimate USB disks - Yeah or nah?

Mr. Robot - January 2, 2017, 1:36 am

I was thinking about getting all the best distros and software, and putting them on "the ultimate USB disk"

It would contain the normal stuff such as portable browsers/applications and drivers - then would have distros such as Kali/Tails/Hirens bootCD/Windows recovery disk/Kaspersky/Kon-boot

You get the idea.

It would be a sleek device with a customizable boot screen, and tools for testing/fixing computers. It would be the ultimate bootable disk.

Would it sell? I mean, sure once I get all the files organized they don't take much time to make but it would be an awesome stick to add to your keychain and carry around at all times.

I don't think many people would buy it. Not many members here really have a use for it and those who buy it will just be interested in having one for the kicks. Considering the use of this would be very low for most members here you can't price it too high either or you'd damage sales. You'd probably want to sticky it in the Beginner Hacking section.

Selling to beginners is probably where you can market it well. This would be counter productive for them though as they wouldn't have the experience of finding, installing, etc. of the software. Again people can learn about all these for themselves given time and that is arguably the right way to do it, so they are only paying for being "spoon fed" along with the convenience of not having to get all the included stuff separately and making it themselves. Pricing it right will be key in my eyes.

There is a market, but I don't see it blowing up on HF. I'd probably buy it. :P

Still being done. None of the software is paid anyhow - they are paying for the compilation of tools and programs together in one, I don't care if it's disallowed.

Is this how youre trying to make that $14k? And maybe you should make a doxing ebook or something.

Nobody would buy it lol

I think it may sell, but not on HF. If it's publicly accessible stuff then most members interested in purchasing it could just get it themselves. I'll PM you a good idea, however.

I mean i would buy it but i currently use this type of bootable usb at the moment for work.

So it's not a unique idea and your market is quite small but it would sell
