I can confirm that i received the files. Will update with the review once tested. Thanks

Ok folks. I had a bit of time last night to install it and test ride. I had to modify the code to make it work on linux and the instructions for this tool are not really accurate but if you got a few brain cells you can make it work.

Cons:

You have to manually confirm accounts in your email - unless you write an extension for this code and make it login and confirm.

Due to the way the accounts are registered it will be easy for SM to notice they are all made by one person so i don't expect these accounts to be usable for social media services. It might be good for spamming and maybe for some other things.

There is no output to the text file with the login details instead they are saved to png in the form of screenshot of login box and it might work well on windows but on linux the file is overwritten after each account so another modification in the code was necessary. If you plan on making 1000s of accounts with this you will have to modify the code to write details to text file or open each image to get login details which defeats the purpose of the tool.

Some programming knowledge is necessary.

Setup and configuration is not for noobs (not really a bad thing but its certainly not a tool with gui and buttons in case you wonder)

I would imagine support is very limited due to the OP being busy all the time.

The whole setup is resource consuming so best way to run it would be some decent vps and by decent i mean 4GB RAM, quadcore.

Op supplied a proxy list but if you want to make lots of accounts you will probably need a scraper too.

Pros:

It's a good starting point for someone who wants to get in the browser automation.

If you can modify it, you should be able to make something out of it.

Those lists are based on my experience with the OP and the product. I've yet to test all bots. Above relates to the twitter bot.

@OP.. You should get someone else to sell it for ya as it seems you are way too busy for this.
