Thread: Best PPI network that allows you to install your own software

licker98 - March 14, 2017, 8:53 am

For my YouTube channel, I think that PPI may work very well, but only if I was able to actually allow the end user to download the actual software at the end.

I remember being on a site that I remember advertising you could upload whatever you wanted and then you would get paid when people would download your software. I assume they attached something to your file or something.

If you remember it, let me know.

Why not just lock your download link with a locker from OGAds?
Check out my sig & PM me if you need help.

Because my viewers use desktop PCs and they frequently complained when I used survey download links.

Also, if something's optional, then they're more likely to go ahead with it than if it was something they were forced to do.

I found one called installpath which allows me to do what I want.

I require a PPI site, not a PPD site.

PPI sites generate revenue because the software publishers pay them for every download there advertisers bring them.

So they' be loosing out on money if they paid you to bring installs to your own software.

They generate revenue when optional software gets installed. That's why it's good to have my own software as the thing that gets installed at the end of the process.
