Thread: South Korea sending people to jail for creating cheats?

Lufasu - March 15, 2017, 9:55 pm

43,000$ or 5 years in jail.

Thoughts?

South Korea has taken a big step toward cracking down on cheating in online games by criminalizing the creation and distribution of aimbots, wall hacks, and anything else not allowed by a game's terms of service. According to a PvPLive report, anyone convicted of doing so could face up to five years in prison (!) or $43,000 in fines.

Maybe not that harsh of punishment, but cheaters ruin the game.. Fully.

Many people would like people to play fairly. Messes it up that someone can fly or see through walls and shit.

Added the full article :)

Its just like what happened with riot sue a scripting site and the owner paid a fine of 10,000,000$. But now its going on to jail on south korea :D

I'm sure you could somehow be sued in America for creating game hacks as well. I doubt there's a law for it directly but they could get you under some odd stipulation, basically since you're making money off of someone elses copyrighted material.

Surprised it hasn't happened yet to be honest (or if it has I wasn't aware) would set a new precedent.

That's pretty crazy, I actually heard about that now that I think about it. The way that company handled it was retarded as fuck lol they had all that coming to them.

I'm not entirely bothered by it tbh as it's annoying as fuck when you want to play a game legit and have your experience ruined by some 12yo "hacker".

Won't do much though because there will always be some 3rd world country that doesn't give a fuck.

This is to far. I don't think they should go to jail, think big company's making money off making cheats should be shut down and fined but not jail. That's to much.

Well, I don't think that countries will do the same thing as south korea, sending people to jail for 5 years its pretty crazy.

But I really hope that it will happen asap so games can be clean af

I only play COD, 2k, and Madden.

Over the years of playing I have not ran into any cheaters, well not that I know of anyway.

If I did, just switch lobbies.

Yeah, Blizzard has successfully sued several WoW bot creators for making a profit off of their game. This newest case isn't even the first time it has happened.

As I recall, thisgamesux was also threatened by Nexon for one of their cheats.

This sounds like fake news to me, and it's stupid, for this reason:

Criminalising cheats will only make cheating become more lucrative and less obvious.

Stashyy - March 19, 2017, 6:59 am

old news but yeah
it's good that they're doing this i wanna see other countries do this

You want to make cheats become almost impossible to detect?

Your name suits you.
I mean countries should arrest and charge cheaters.

Thanks, yours doesn't.

Arresting cheaters with obvious hacks yeah, that ought to put an end to the real problematic cheating for sure...

no no my friend
i dont cheat in video games

Cuthbert - March 19, 2017, 8:04 am

I would rather be able to tell when somebody is obviously cheating, than have cheats become too sophisticated to detect due to the criminalisation.

Super Fun Guy - March 19, 2017, 8:12 am

Lmfao, I can imagine the day I get arrested and all my projects seized. I wouldn't even be mad, I'd be laughing all the way to my little blue piss stained mat and blanket.

reBELLYus - March 19, 2017, 8:16 am

Not something that is cool, nor viable for the future. Cheating on video games means nothing.
