USMC Scout Sniper? You're a bad ass sir tip my hat to you.

M?tt - April 21, 2017, 5:31 pm

If you're a scout sniper, wouldn't that make it your MOS and not your rank? Rank would actually be Private or something along those lines.

my MOS is 0317, but most people don't know what it means and go by Scout Sniper.

but we do have ranks, you have to be atleast a Lance corporal to even be selected to go through training.

But you are correct.

Edit:

AFSC, nice.

AFSC is for the Air Force and MOS is for Army and Marines and Navy I believe. But I was just curious what rank you were as far as E1-E9.

If you're curious about my AFSC, it's 2A831C.

I've met an US Army soldier on omegle one day and it was awesome to talk with him. Since Switzerland is neutral and doesn't stick it's nose in other countries :DD I've never talked to a real soldier till then :) Whats your statement on Warmovies like American Sniper etc? & what kind of Sniper are you using if I may ask

That's pretty neat actually, I'm guessing that's something you learn overtime. Our natural instinct isn't to check for someone else's danger over our own I'm guessing.

Well, I got a call of re-deployment in 3 months because the terror attacks on my country.
I do not want to serve again as a warrior because to be honest, I'm kind of scared at 2017.
Any vouches on how can I avoid it?

Serious questions..

Have you killed any threats/terrorists yourself yet? If so, before you take the shot, what's the most prominent thought in your mind? (You don't need to answer this one if it is too deep or personal.)

Also, what are your thoughts on Trump as a soldier and his take on ISIS/War?

I can kind of add onto this along with OPs comment. In the end, you're taking someone from the Earth that is actively seeking the direct or indirect bodily harm of you, your buddies, your family, and all other Americans. The thought of this makes pulling the trigger easier, but in the end of the day you just deprived someone of life, took someone away from their family, etc. For some veterans, that can really dig deep which is why you typically shouldn't ask questions pertaining to killing. Some of us don't have that connection and aren't as bothered as taking that life, as it's our job and what we signed up to do, but it's usually best to avoid that subject matter entirely.

I met a lot of fantastic people, but I also lost a lot of great friends. I completely respect you for keeping your comrades out of this - I rarely talk about it myself.

If you don't mind me asking, has it ever gone so far for you, that you ended up having to go to a psychologist after being deployed? I have to admit, I did have a lot of visits. It's hard not having anyone to talk to about what happened. I would never be able to talk to my girlfriend about all the situations, as I don't want her to know what brutal things occurred in the war, but then again, not having anyone to talk to is extremely hard. I spoke to the army's very own psychologist - she was amazing and really helped me out in rough times.

Pushing yourself towards taking the first visit is the hardest, but once you have met one of those amazing people, you will love coming back. Opening yourself up, having someone there for you who

It does not matter if you are from the US or not, you are from the UK, therefore, you should be grateful for both people serving, wearing the British military badge, or the U.S. Army badge. The US and the UK are working together with many other countries, in order to maintain security in this world.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/United_Kingdom%E2%80%93United_States_relations - Be grateful for people who risk(ed) their lives, to make sure you can go to work every day -- and for you having a freedom.

Also, fuck the people pretending to have served - what do they get out of it? Absolutely nothing. I rarely tell people I served, as there is no reason for people to know, but when I meet a fellow comrade in a place like HF, then I will definitely be talking to him about it. It is very easy to differ out people who pretend to have served, or people who actually have served. People bragging about 'confirmed kills', or 'missions' they have been on, are most likely people full of shit. Anyone who has served knows how hard it is to be a mission, both physically, but also mentally. Nobody who has ever served would be boasting about their 'confirmed kills.'

Cause it's fake... I don't even see why it's a "cool" thing to be in the army to be honest. I respect soldiers but those who don't stop mentioning it are annoying. Like wow you're a soldier, doesn't really require much skill if the average being can join the army.

I look up to rich CEO's and businessmen more than I do soldiers, this world is about looking out for yourself and living it to the fullest. But yeah, I do respect them if the reason they're in the army is to protect there people.

I served, and I would never talk about casualties, whether it was friendlies or enemies. It is rough going through death(s), whether it is your own comrades or filthy terrorists.

Only person I have ever talked to about anything related to the war was the military psychologist.

Draft, Israel.

And if you will see the news, the current situation in my country isn't well, soldiers dying almost each day by terrorism.

Deployment time on 7/24/2017.

Its all about your "profile", like last time I was in the military it was 97 (the highest).

and If you have 97, you most go to a fighting force and if you dont want you need to go in jail/get yourself one BEST coverup for this.
