Thread: So what is the Final RAT?

kahoot - May 3, 2017, 2:04 pm

-KFC Backed out (LuminosityLink is pretty much gone now that they require the client to be in the same country)
-NanoCore Dead
-IM will soon be down apparently

So what is the new RAT to use? I am NOT saying I am going to be using the RAT for illegal purposes but ya know.

Dare I say Orcus?

Mr. Robot - May 3, 2017, 2:06 pm

Uh idk pupy? Empire? Who cares. Whatever gives you a connection right?

Haha yeah I guess, looking for a very stable RAT that can hold a lot of clients that has Socks 5.

Its all about preference buddy! Prepare to get bomb'd with advertising of "our is best rat" replies.

I just want the one that gets the job done (socks 5).

And yeah that's why I posted the thread, all of them say "we have the best rat" but want opinions from real members

Why not have multiple setups /virtualmachines on different IPs if privacy is an issue and safely hold multiple clients on each. Not hard to get socks working on metasploit.

If you are strictly using it for legal purposes only then yes, Orcus is a great pick.

If not don't bother.

I say the complete opposite. OP if you plan on using it for illegal purposes, go buy Orcus right now, it's your best bet!

Spoiler \(Click to View\) Clearly a joke, OP can go spend his money on legal software and they make money while he gets banned from the product = win win for Orcus

Also, Orcus has install dialog also.

Haha, not incriminating myself nor am I saying anything.

RAT owners know deep down, without people using it for Malicious reasons, there would be not enough sales to even keep up. I mean, how many people are possibly going to use a RAT for their computer business or whatever. Too many problems idk argue with me but I won't change my mind on that. Huge respect to anyone who owns a RAT though.

Any RATs that dont have Install dialogs?

You release any public information on the next "largest" update? The html one was awesome, I gave Imminent a black and red theme cuss why not :P

Surge0n - May 3, 2017, 3:05 pm

@op, go get netwire and get some peace of mind as regards to banning, shutting down, install dialogues or selective executions.

Only wish i could find the most suitable crypter for netwire that's also coded in C/C++ with the cross platform functions as well. All native crypters on hf are just for windows

True, but when you have owners who watch there customers for abuse like hawks I'd argue that your argument is no longer valid. Treat software like guns, you can use it for unintended malicious purposes just as you can use a web-scanner to scan a website you don't own, or use a chat application to spread viruses, this doesn't mean said software's shouldn't exist.

I personally use Imminent Monitor and Orcus (used to use Luminosity) because of the features they posses in helping me identify real malware in other people's computers. I own Orcus because I can't take my desktop with me everywhere and I still want to be able to access clients on my laptop (3 computers allowed per license).

I'd be happy to give everyone out there plenty of screenshots of times I've reported and gotten people's licenses banned for abuse, alot more people use these softwares for REAL reasons than you may realize.

P.S. if someone wants to give Orcus / Imminent free money (cuss they get banned for abuse) what on earth could be the issue with that?

13uNkNoWn - May 3, 2017, 3:29 pm to the OP.

No matter what tool you use, no matter how much they say there they will be around forever... Every software can come to an end...

Especially software that you are looking for, without install dialog, made for malicious intent. They just all eventually get shut down, or lose interest and shutdown.

Orcus claims they will go open source and allow all the software to run free when they shut down... but really that's if everything goes right.

So it's always a risk of losing your investment... unless you learn to code your own... then you control it.

take the risk and buy one... in the end its usually less than $100... and if its important, that's not very much $

What makes those rats legal and not the others?

The legal ones will ban your license with the slightest hint of malicious use or reports of them being used maliciously (proof provided and investigation pending).

They are VERY clear that they do not intend for their respective software to be used maliciously.

I can only speak towards Orcus on this point that they have gone themselves to their law enforcement and been classed as a legitimate legal tool for remote admin use.

Do some digging and you will find many, many threads and debates about it.

(May 4, 2017 05:20 PM)The Unknown Coder Wrote: [\[CITE\]](#) What makes those rats legal and not the others?

Let me put it this way, the developers of RATs listed under 'legal' will press that ban button with a smile on their face once you're confirmed to be a malicious user.

The non-legal category is more a case of, the developer does not care or has no way to monitor.

13uNkNoWn - May 5, 2017, 7:51 am

That's my only problem with Orcus...

Advertise the best RAT, with standard malicious RAT features, but ban people who use those features the way those features were intended to be used in the first place.

great way to make money... then they don't need to support those people, they have less people spreading/making it non FUD.. less people getting them in trouble etc.

and some of those people may find a way to get around the ban, and purchase again... hey double your money!

Plus they monitor you... makes it seem like they have included a RAT in their RAT in a way...

Just like a sysadmin doesn't need to hack his own systems, they don't need to hack you... you agree to let them monitor your system.

And how much you wanna bet... one simple command will update all of those users into full on slaves.

We will never truly know, even if they end up going open source, they could take out that piece of code...

In orcus TOS it state you cant crypt it. But I use it as a nanny tool to my family's kids to keep them safe from real hackers and creeps. The only way there PC can have a anti virus and a RAT is if you crypt it. So I dont fucking understand why that is a TOS rule. They know 99.9 of the people using it even for legal reasons are going to break that rule.

Inject0rrent - May 5, 2017, 10:11 am

This is nonsense. You can make an exception in every Av software and allow any rat to run.

It's a quick way to ban offending users when there is a lack of other proof.

Quite smart to be honest.
