If you feel like you need some vouches to go up , Feel free to give it out . Anyways , good luck with it . You seems like a experienced designer and How much you cost for a thread design , a flat one ? Is that based on the effort you put and the flatness or it is a fix price ?

I collaborate with the client to find a price that is fair and corresponding to the amount of work the work/project needs :)

You put too much spacing between your words for somebody who has been designing for 6 years. I also don't understand the inconsistency in your thread design, but anyway, good luck with sales.

The spacing makes it more readable, and overall better looking.

The thread is consistent, and I've measured the exact amount of pixels between every element on the thread design, so I'm not sure what you mean.

Can you elaborate? :)

Can you elaborate? :)The images on the right in the "thread designs" part, they're inconsistent and a little blurry (perhaps intentionally, but the blur is inconsistently implemented in the 3 different images which makes it look untidy). The Yore Designs text on the "header" is kinda hard to read, maybe you should make a little box in the background or put a solid gradient on the background image with low opacity to increase visibility. The gap between the words might make it look more tidy, agreed, but the gap between the actual letters make it look kinda abnormally elongated and intentionally spaced, which doesn't usually go well with round fonts like you have used. You should also lower your shadow distances, they are too much for the spread you are using.

Still, I like the fact that you didn't just download a website template PSD and turn it into a thread design like some big dawgs here who call themselves "the best", do. So cheers for that, I can see you're capable of making good designs, so vouch for that as well.

Props to you for pointing that out! This thread design was made around 5 months ago, and perhaps I overlooked a few things.

I'll make some minor changes, and take what you said into consideration :)

Thanks, Rush!
