Haha , why not you try scanning those gov sites with Acunetix and see if its vulnerable to SQLI.

I'd suggest you start by mastering a general-purpose programming language first (Python is great). every "hacker" needs to be good with at least one programming language,

You'd also want to know networking to a certain extent so you could make things like rats, botnets, etc.

From there the sky's the limit really, just keep on learning new things and practicing.

Good luck.

Everything you see won't be in this cool green text and have this big loading bar on it and you can bruteforce anything in 5 minutes it just doesn't work like that.

Simply start by learning your basic languages for your first year because I promise you that you won't be "L33T" in a year. No one takes that "L33T Hacker" terminology seriously on this forum so I'd recommend removing that from your vocabulary.

As upgraded members, we have access to Omni's private webshell.

It's by far the best and only tool you'll need to hack into major databases.

Usually you'd have to be upgraded, but I'll give you it on the house:

Good luck OP. ?

But seriously, don't get into this field by depending on automated tools that you have no idea how to use.

Read up, practice skills, be responsible against live hosts. Mistakes may well get you arrested.

Look through my eBook collection, learn manual web-hacking and networking, perhaps even a programming language to help write scripts that you make.

Best of luck. ?

Don't put l33ts on a pedestal. Take away their daddy's credit cards, and most of them are just like you.

If you want real advice, just message Omni. We have been chatting for two weeks, and he clears all my doubts.

Green on black is hard on my eyes. I much prefer dark blue on grey. ?

BeemerWT - July 7, 2017, 10:07 am

So is this a trollpost? Someone being sarcastic?

If you're genuinely interested in hacking, I would recommend learning how to program C++, but start with Python as you will get the fundamentals of programming down.

The problem with learning how to "hack" things is that you find out most of it is social engineering, or coercing your victim into downloading your files or giving you their information so you can "retrieve their account" pretending to be them. I wanna say "true" hacking doesn't exist anymore, but that's not necessarily true. That being said, a lot of the exploits are fixed very fast, so you have to learn how to find them more so than you have to learn how to implement them.

Wait im confused are you saying you can get l33t for free?

Nope, OP is trying to become a "1337 hacker" by using pre-made scripts and getting people to spoonfeed him because he's too technically inept to use Google. ?

Have you literally just upgraded as I was typing that? Or am I going insane? ?
