Lukas is Asian and we all know we can trust Asians with our eyes closed (pun intended).

He's super good though, don't hesitate to get your web development done from him.

Can't message but I got an interesting idea. Not sure if you're involved with social media but basically when users bot their accounts it becomes blatantly obviously their botting because they have 50,000 followers and 2 likes on their photos.

What if someone created a botting service (you potentially) that for every 1 real follower you get a fake one is added. Once a fake follower is added a fake view/like based on percentages (let's say 50% of someone's followers like 2 out of every 3 posts made, that percentage would be transferred into the program and then outputted as fake views/likes).

This could work across any social media platform and would be considered a virtually undetectable botting method.

If you're not popular at all and don't gain any legit followers, you could do this in bulk with just all fake followers. Basically add, for example, 1000 fake followers and then have the bot (based off like/view average percentages taken from other pages) add likes/views to your posts to make everything look legit.

The potential could be really crazy if this is marketed correctly.

Not sure if this sparks any interest for you but there's this really simple website I would love to have made, hopefully you can do it!

Sounds good on paper but would likely flop in practice. You're making an assumption that 100% of the real followers will like 66% of the posts? Crazy. No way this will ever happen.

Need to update the OP. I had someone claim a vouch copy and I'm currently creating a landing page for one of my clients. Live work will be displayed within a few days.

At the beginning of my thread you can find my Behance link. It contains images of some sites that I've developed.
