This rule only applies to the superficial layer of thinking, and displays a severe lack of understanding. Doing unto others as you would have them do unto you does not account for the different needs of different individuals, and forces your needs and ideologies upon others.

Just some very irrelevant thoughts of mine, but people who are here to love and help should be understanding of others and their differences.

Or... it is subjective and means different things to different people.

The true question is what does that quote mean to this group. :)

"We are not here to judge. We are here to love and to help. " but you're invite only so you're inviting users you deemed worthy, in which case judging not only them but also everyone else for not being worthy?

Who gives a fuck what it means to your deluded group, the question is what does it actually mean. Philosophy is about discovering truth, not deluding yourself, if you want base everything you know on your own interpretation check out theology instead.
