I had a Pitt bull, she wanted to attack my uncle one day because he made me upset. Wonder what would have happened if she wasn't tied up... Anyways now I own a small poddle looking thing that's chill and doesn't bark much until someone knocks at the door. Sadly he's at my parents house because I can't keep dogs in my dorm. I hear he's very protective of my little brother and sister. I perfer small dogs now, easier to take care of and they can live anywhere... except dorms.

I mean, you can't even say that he's wrong. Any kind of animal could be harmful. It really does just depend on how they were treated/taught. If you treated your dog like that retarded stereotype, of course they're gonna imitate that stereotype. If you treated them with respect and like any other pet, they would love you and would make great pets, but I must agree that every animal will have "animal instincts".

If a lot of dogs noticed another animal (i.e. a cat), they'd try to chase after it, but that doesn't apply to every single dog. If you harm any animal, of course they're gonna attempt to harm you back. That's literally just common sense. My point is, not all pitbulls are dangerous.

Quann - December 19, 2017, 8:18 am

Man, I don't care what no one says. It all has to do with training, pit bulls are naturally aggressive and if not trained properly they will turn against you. I seen a guy with 8 Pits and they all get along well with each other and they are very well trained. My thing is if you do not have the money to send your pit to get trained or learn to train them yourself do not get one simple.

nicksaban1 - December 19, 2017, 8:53 am

I have had several pits, and they are/were absolutely adorable. I have a full blood blue nose, and he is huge with rippling muscles. He loves everybody, even new strangers(not really a good thing, especially where we live). He roams free around our house and we have never had a problem with them. They have the most peculiar personalities and full of energy.

Poor lady in OP probably was trying to prevent her dogs from fighting with each other, or for trying to chase a squirrel, or she could even have been too rough with discipline. There are just some things you don't do with ANY breed of dogs.

CyberStrike - December 19, 2017, 9:01 am

Did anyone else pay attention to "puncture wounds in the skull" Second thing they say the first injuries were to the face/throat area. I really do not think this is a dog attack. Dogs make a mess of things, if anyone here ever has lived on a farm or has experience with feral dogs you will know what I am saying. Usually an animal is bitten down low to prevent escape or using the legs for a prolonged time. A puncture wound to the skull is not "normal" in a dog attack, but it is for other animals.

If her dogs did it they should be destroyed, but it isn't a reason to ban a breed. If anyone here remembers in the 80's doberman's were the death dog and in the 90's rotties .

Edit: My pit right now I know that she knows when not to do something, we had a friend who brought over their 2 yr old and my pit mix were playing with her ball, well she knew that although she couldn't see his hand and only saw the ball she knew not to try and grab the ball as his hand was there. Owners have to set limits and boundary's for their dogs. If her dogs did this and I am being very serious it doesn't sound like it from a few little details that they gave but don't line up with dog attacks something serious had occurred like no rules were set for those dogs.

If anyone wants check out Rancher's Guide To Predator Attacks on Livestock you will see that the attack doesn't fit the pattern of a dog attack.

Percent of dog attacks per breed as a percentage of he breed.

Wismec - December 19, 2017, 8:41 pm

God, this is such a bummer to see. I've had dogs my entire life. My parents and I got my pitbull-lab mix Lacy when I was 12. I'm 18 now and she is still one of the sweetest animals I've ever developed a relationship with...toward us.

When we first got her she was nice to everybody. I think that's because she hadn't developed a relationship with anything yet. It was as soon as she started realizing that we loved and cared for her that she became super protective. She bit a couple of my friends when I was growing up, one was pretty bad. If I'm ever staying the night at my parents house, the moment I wake up and start moving she starts squealing with joy and rubs against me as hard as she can.

There are a few cases that give pit bulls a bad name. Yes, there is absolutely no denying that they are one of if not the most aggressive breed of domesticated canine, but that is what you sign up for. I really can't imagine a pitbull killing its owner under any circumstance other than mental illness of the animal or a genuine threat by said owner, but I'm not always right.

Look at what Dr. Amy Learn states, there is more, sometimes DNR (Department of Natural Resources) or Fish & Game doesn't want to scare the public and so some things are not said. For example it was commonly said that mountain lions were not east of the Mississippi until photo's in NC/Michigan surfaced, same thing in Kentucky they call them "Ghost Cats" just a wandering animal supposedly from Florida.

Also not showing intention is purely a human trait, just like lying.

Dog's do not normally do these things, no matter the breed. And the attack just doesn't fit the profile, of dogs. Usually they make a big mess, and for cattle you will see ears bit and legs as well initially. I am sure that something is not being said, those dogs ran off her dad more than likely it was something other than those dogs.

Puncturing the back of the skull/neck area is a ambush predator hallmark.

Now onto sweeps and ratings

You got nothing else to say? No experience with any animals which you can refer to. No experts that knew the victim and the dogs? Of course not because you have zero experience in some things. Now you find the need to insult me well done. You neglected everything that I wrote with evidence to back it up.

<https://www.caninejournal.com/dog-bite-statistics/>

Chihuahua 's actually top the list good thing you pointed that out, I greatly appreciate you asking me to look up that fact for you to help me prove my argument further.

And about pitbulls being so inbred, let me ask you if a dog breed has hip dysplasia why would they breed it to a pit? Pitbulls are like any other dog just they get the most bad press. Do you own any dogs BTW? Just so you and I are clear if her dogs did it I 100% believe that they should be put down, yet no one breed is inherently bad. This is like looking at the population of the prison system and saying "All criminals are X race". It doesn't work like that.

Edit:

What does Kentucky DNR say about Mountain Lions btw?

Farshad, I am not sure if you understand that DNR often will lie to keep the public from taking matters into their own hands, often a rare/endangered species that has a bad reputation is hushed up. It is much easier to claim dogs did something than scaring the public.

A good example of this is the Javan Tiger long said to be extinct until it attacked and ate a person in 2008.

He might just be a troll, although seeing that OP wants a Bernese Mountain Dog, he also doesn't really know that they have a very high prey drive. I really think that he might not know any better. Also that breed of dog is not the most friendly and can be animal aggressive, mix that with general I dunno what I am doing we should wait for the news report. FYI OP I'll stick up for your dog as well, so no worries there.

I'm gonna point out here you are just so wrong it's not funny.

Earlier you said pit bulls are the least owned dog with the most attacks. First you are wrong, they are not even close to the least owned dog. Second, you are also wrong about them having the most attacks. Chihuahuas and Bull Dogs both have more reported bites than Pitbulls

I think it's time you admit you are an autist and just leave.

Hotsauce™ - December 21, 2017, 3:09 pm

It's not the damn breed. It's how the owners treated, trained and exposed their dog.

DenzelisWizrd - December 21, 2017, 3:16 pm

CyberStrike - December 21, 2017, 4:13 pm

There are two types of aggression with dogs, human and animal. Generally "guard breeds" will operate a bit differently with humans and it should be noted that pitbulls are very far from a guard breed. Pitbulls tend to show more animal aggression, everyone that owns a pitbull will tell you that they are crummy guard dogs. And if animal aggression is not addressed quickly and in a consistent manner then you end up with a dog that attacks other animals

Actually this is a real odd balled case, the owner was a dog trainer, people who knew the dogs said they were rather submissive, seems that the owner was having some kind of housing issues and the dogs were at her fathers, also the due to some of the facts released at first the sherrifs dept. did another press conference today. Since there was many people who also said that the initial release of information made no sense, to those familiar with dogs. It just is bonkers I don't think they had a real explanation to "why". The best they came up with was her dad kept these dogs outside, and the owner was not there every moment yet the owner did come 5 times at least a week. Also no bite to the throat either, that was incorrect. Honestly and I have dealt with powerful dogs both rotties and American Bulldogs that were "alpha" type dogs, and it just doesn't make sense in my head that this happens just out of the blue.

Also one of her friends rounded up the dogs, with no incident, so to me that isn't very convincing when we think of human aggression. Generally animals will test you a few times or become a bit more forceful as a test. I have seen this both with dogs as well as actual predators that were kept as "pets".

Apparently the injuries were to such a level that analysis of bites was not very likely. They do believe that there may have been feeding activity as well on the body. To those who know dogs, this is a very weird set of things. But a breed is not the problem, I have seen professional trainers/handlers get attacked but usually this is for police/military type of training.

Edit: No matter what this is a sad case setting aside whatever could have happened, I am sure that the family is still trying to make sense of everything that happened. All in all just a sad thing that happened here.

You are avoiding the question here so you are either very inexperienced with dogs, or you don't know and you are joking around in this whole thread. I am trying to be serious an animal is a responsibility, not sure if I should just joking with you or actually explain further so you and the dog you are thinking about getting end up being unhappy.

Do you understand about herding breeds?

Size is a big factor in this, while a bite to a finger from a small dog may break skin on larger dogs it will end up being a broken/severed finger.

The couple from Colleyville say their toddler, Luca Romero, was stroking dogs at the Dallas Pets Alive event when a pit bull-Labrador mix attacked him.

It was awful,' his mother Allis Cho said. 'It literally dragged him to the ground and would not let go. It was flailing him around.'

'What we want is for this dog to be euthanized,' Alan Romero, his father, said.

'It was an unprovoked attack. This dog is dangerous. He mauled a little kid and will probably do it again.'
