Bragging/posting about your gains will likely put a target on your back (for hackers).

Be safe when talking about your investments and how much money you're dealing with.

Aside from the rest of the comments, I appreciate this reminder

Ravioli - December 29, 2017, 4:48 pm

ya once you get to a certain point just shut the fuck up lol. completely agree

If you brag on HF it doesnt really matter cus 90% of those who brag do not have the money but standerd just stay humble :)

If you believe that OP is being paranoid, read this:

It's a very real problem. Broadcasting your net worth over the internet is the stupidest thing you can do.

To add to this, make sure you have all your coins off exchanges.

If you do have coins on exchanges make sure 2fa is enabled at least.

I recommend holding your coins in an offline wallet or invest in a leger or trezor.

Hardware wallets are always a good idea too. Do your best not to store coins on exchanges.

Best advice given right here.

I always store offline onto my ledger and ledger is locked up in floor safe.

I don't think this is a big problem for people who brag about making a decent amount of money, like $10-$100k. As long as your funds are secure, there should be no problem. Cryptic has made threads about him making hundreds of thousands of dollars and I don't think his funds weren't stolen.

Did you know that you are supposed to pay taxes when you do a transaction ? Youre also supposed to pay taxes on trades even if they are not cashed out.

The IRS subsequently limited its demand to ask only for accounts that conducted bitcoin transactions—either exchanging bitcoin for dollars, or sending or receiving coins from another bitcoin user—worth $20,000 or more.

That will actually depend on your local laws and how cryptocurrency is being taxed.

if the irs wants to do the work to look through all my tx's and tell me how much I owe i'll pay it not gunna dig through hundreds of tx and calculate it. if they really want my money that much they'll do that do thatI literally have 10 different exchanges and 1,000s of transactions since January of last year.

When I cash out next year I will report it, but will just pay someone or just go by the amount I started with and then cashed out.

It would be near impossible for me to even find all that info now.
