Not even going to lie... from work, I don't think I've ever received a check that's higher than $1,200 at any given time. I've worked at 2 places (food industry) as a teenager. Currently, now, I run my own business (business to business solutions). My "biggest" account is a $600/month check (the benefit of what I do is I get to manage a lotttt of clients). I have yet to get that "big" paycheck/check for something, maybe the day I sell the business w/ all the accounts.. lol

no complaints on my end though

This is a good question (I'm also wondering). I didn't consider this, but then again I don't really pay myself a salary for what I do. Whatever I make is put back into the business.

Unless it was under the table. You should've received Overtime if you're in the US for anything more than 40 hours considering 40hrs is the max for Full Time and anything after that is Over Time,

Last month, when I cashed out $162,340 worth of BTC just before it crashed. That's the biggest sum of money I've ever had, I'd consider it a pay check, as I invested in BTC in 2011, spent almost half of what I invested at the time, bought a new computer and completely forgot about it until 2017's BTC explosion.. spent an hour and a half searching my attick and basement for the computer it was on lmao.

Now after investing my winnings, im earning at least $2300-$5000 a week which goes straight back into the investment bonds minus my own little profit margin.

When I made that statement I am speaking on planning and coordination of entire data centers, not some small company setup (although I take that business too)

It is what I was trained to do in my actual certifications. So for people to be surprised "Armada managed/designs infrastructures" kind of baffles me at times.
