Scriph - February 1, 2018, 4:18 pm

I once paid for someone $200 in snacks.

I feel rich when I have $1000 or more and tend to throw away money like crazy

Ganja - February 1, 2018, 4:18 pm

Giving a friend a room in my house for free to avoid him becoming homeless.

Mr. Robot - February 1, 2018, 4:35 pm

Armada - February 1, 2018, 6:34 pm

I consider this just being a decent human being... But here goes...

I was on the way to work, middle of winter, so I wore like 2x pairs of everything (Its cold here, and I work outside as security a lot of the time)

I watched a guy get on the subway, his clothes were just tattered, to the point they were even barely to be called clothing. "drapping" was a better descriptor for this situation.

Dude looked broken, like he had simply given up on life, he looked exhausted, likely pan handling or freezing from our elements all night.

I literally stripped down, gave him my secondary set of clothes, went to my wallet and handed him everything I had in cash ($30, maybe) and advised him of the closest shelter I could think of.

I had some retarded chick in some fur coat give me this look like "Why would you even talk to this person" and I pretty much wanted to piss on her, She was so distraught over the entire situation, she got off the very next stop, although I know it was not her stop. loool

I try to do at least one nice thing a day for someone.

I've bought this homeless guy a breakfast roll near my apartment every day for the past month.

Money wise? I've paid a few peoples debts every so often when they're feeling flooded and couldn't handle it.

Offering a meal is a easy and beneficial to help out as well.

I live in a very large city, and although I might want to assist someone if I give them cash feel it will go to the wrong reasons. (Drugs, etc...)

So the easy solution is offer a meal.

I have also gotten to know many great people jut having a chat with them as they ate, if I did or not....

Paid my best friend's moms' rent two months in a row so they wouldn't have to move 5 hours away with their grandparents. Also gave them a car that was handed down to me from a deceased family member. They ended up selling it to pay more bills. I was in high school when I did all of this. Valuable lesson learned.

Indeed I think the best thing to offer to those in need is a meal. Given that, in many cases, when handing money results in other than what will keep them alive and healthy, offering food will kee their stomach full, body strength and just overall a good choice.

I've given well over 50+ meals in the past few months when I am out with my friends and a lot of them are grateful where as there were a few that were rude and picky. Some even denied an offering of food and insisted on receiving money instead. Though, in some cases, people do need money to travel (bus or transit fare).

mrhappycode90 - February 2, 2018, 11:39 am

Recently put a homeless dude in a room for a night when there was a storm, gave him enough money to get some food, made sure he had the facilities to have a hot shower and some extended room time to just relax and be out of the cold.

Well, it's not what I did, it's what I do. Even though in my country they say that good things you do should be kept for your self, I'll share this one little thing.

Me and my father every month send 500$ worth of food and other necessary things to a poor family like 60 miles away from us. She is a single mother with 3 small kids, living in a 40ft, I can't even call it a house, it a building with two rooms, one of which is empty and the other one has 2 couches and a stove. It breaks my heart everytime I go there and see her 3 kids faces when I give them the chocolates and chips I bought for them.

Something else my girl and me do is every fall, start of winter, we go through our clothing (I am a terrible clothes hoarder, I got more clothing than most women do, honestly) and we will make up "Packs" including a paid of clothing both for men and women, include some staple foods, a fire kit, and I have a deal worked out with a surplus distributor I have known for about 20 some odd years now, we do bulk orders of tents and other essential gear, sleeping bags, etc, and he hooks me up at the base price.

We make about 50-70 of these a year and come mid December/early January we go down to the areas most affected and distribute them.

If it was only viable to do that for them all. That was a nice act indeed though, I am sure they will not forget it. ?

A lot of people just go and dump their pets when they no longer want them anymore.

Many things did but if we except giving money since its most common, one thing I can think is I helped a person to pass highschool exams even though I wasn't obligated and knew most likely he wouldn't do that for me.

(Feb 5, 2018 02:30 PM)Riyu~?? Wrote: [\[CITE\]](#) They were out looking for him so I assumed it was a mistake.

Ahh, yea that is kinda rude to not even thank you then.

We had an instance where someones dog was roaming around our area, using the dogs tags I was able to contact the owner.

They kinda played it off, no more than 3 days later I found the same dog wandering around this time with no tags or collar.

I ended up phoning the SPCA and reported the incident. Apparently the guy tried to give the dog away and no one wanted it because of its age, so instead of surrendering the animal to a shelter, he just wanted to dump the dog off to fend for itself.

Reason I asked if you were sure, is the SPCA told me that its common for animal owners trying to dump their pets off and abandon them to forget to remove the tags.

Alex - February 5, 2018, 3:52 pm

Well, on here I've done giveaways of EP1C ranks and gift awards. I gave away 2 gift awards just because someone asked for one. (And no, please don't pm me asking for any more free awards and upgrades)

In IRL? Paying for my friends food all the time I guess. It's always nice to do something nice to someone else because. Love seeing others happy around me.
