Either do it legally, or just annoy them to the point of paying me back.

You know how annoying it is to have missionaries at your door daily?

Saltpeter - February 5, 2018, 7:35 pm

I'm not the type to get scammed in the first place. If I did get scammed and they were that close to me I would definitely pay them a visit.

Kill him and eat his frontal lobes, I've heard it cures autism.

No, but really call the cops or pay him a visit yourself.

I'd show up to the house, ask for it back and emphasize i'm not leaving them alone until I have it. Getting physical on their property wouldn't be ideal, so if it got to that level, i'd wait for the opportunity elsewhere.

Obviously, you want to hear one out of the box answer, so I won't give you one.

First, I'd knock on his door, and ask him for my money back. More than likely he'd say no, so then I'd just simply call up the police and file a report.

It's as simple as that.

In that case, your plan would go sideways.

The scammer could easily file a police report, and instead of him doing something wrong, you would be in the wrong as well.

Prophett - February 6, 2018, 7:39 am

Even then I feel like they wouldn't even care to go to the person's house. That's just how the people on here are. Personally, if I got scammed $1k and I knew where he lived I would create a police report. Doing it legally is the easiest, because,

If I beat his ass? I could go to jail.

If somebody else beats his ass for me? I could be the reason.

Contact the authorities with evidence that you were scammed by the person in question and take it through the legal system. There is honestly no point in you causing trouble or visiting them personally, I'm assuring you that more problems would arise from this. This type of money, $1,000, is actually a fair amount of money and I could name a few people that would do terrible things for that money, all though it's not entirely life changing in any form. If you have all the evidence you need, I'm sure contacting the cops is the best way about it. If everything was done on some sort of encrypted chat, my response would vary. I don't want to be the one to suggest you should pay him a visit because I don't know you or your mentality.

I would wait outside their home casually in the car, pushing down on the horn with all my force non stop for 30+ mins till somebody walks outside to see what's going on. At that moment the car door swings open hard as shit I get out, look into the camera and shout WORLDSTAR & WHAT UP HACKFOURMS. The confused individual will instantly know he has no options but to take the intense beating. I walk to him, very slowly, stuttering he says I ca- I ca--I can p-p-p-pay you ba-back. That's no longer an option son. I get within swinging range. He closes his eyes and puts his hands over his face, while crying of course. A minute goes by, the individual is confused and terrified. He slowly puts his hands down. He still can't see though... Why? Because he got roundhouse TKO'd and thrown in the trunk of my car. Don't ask where I am taking him.

You guys act like you never heard the phrase "If it's 2 good to be true IT PROBABLY IS". I never got scammed on HF, I can read people and how they think. So currency exchange scams equate to low IQ? Trust $\neq$ intelligence

Kareem - February 8, 2018, 11:09 pm

Get as much info as I can so j can blackmail them or make a better plan

Prophet Banana - February 8, 2018, 11:19 pm

I'd knock on his door and inform him that he made me very upset then I'd go back home.

CocaColax - February 9, 2018, 12:28 am

1. Send an hooker
2. the hooker will lead him to motel
3. than I get in the motel and kicks his ass

Mr. Robot - February 9, 2018, 2:15 am

Honestly i'd hack the shit outta him and fuck up his life,

XwhoXamXiX - March 8, 2018, 12:28 am

Without a doubt ask for your money back ... most scammers do this because they think the anonymity of online protects them from the consequences of their actions..once they realise this is not the case i am sure they will refund you... good luck

ven0m - March 8, 2018, 1:33 am

Gather enough evidence to prosecute him, then go to the police and tell them everything assuming you were not doing something shady in Hack Forums in the first place.

Hayley Williams - March 8, 2018, 1:43 am

Oh shit lol

I got scammed for a couple hundred bucks not too long ago actually and it was an exit scam so I pulled a dox on him and started texting him that if he doesn't pay me back + interest I'm going to personal visit his house. He didn't believe me so I sent a paid pizza bc I'm nice as proof that I know where he lives.

He sent me the money back lol, but I would have kicked his ass if he didn't. He lives with his parents too so I would have had a nice talk with them

Ash Ketchum - March 8, 2018, 1:51 am i would find him get my money and everything else expensive he owns then slap the shit out of the kid until he knew he was my bitch and then go home, if he tried to fight back or refuse i would break his arms and destroy his house and then take everything

Renowned - March 8, 2018, 7:12 am

I guess I'd get a friend to come with me and talk to them OR I'd just call the police and ask for their assistance. No point hurting someone over money.

SIM-3838342 - March 8, 2018, 7:20 am

An eye for an eye? IMO an outdated approach. Increase pressure on him, but stay away from illegal measures, i'd advice.

An eye for an eye leaves the whole world blind.

Ninja - March 8, 2018, 8:16 am

I would knock and ask for my money back one time. If he doesn't listen, then I would find some way to have fun with his house. Maybe I'll throw some garbage by his front door and make him clean it up.

JoshAllen - March 8, 2018, 8:18 am

Idk, for 4 digits, I would probably just do it the legal way.
If it was a couple hundred, I would probably just go and ask for it back.
They would probably be scared enough from that point anyways.

I would love to someone to scam me and them be in Chicago

But would that be worth it? Just call the police and leave them to deal with it.

Know what the police will tell you?

"Take it to civil court."

Police don't care about someone robbing you unless it happens in broad daylight on the street. Get robbed online? File a report, and hope somethings miraculous happens where they actually look at it.

In the UK I doubt it would happen like that, surely there's some sort of law against stealing money online?

Bear - March 9, 2018, 12:22 pm

I would probably try to find out as much information on this person as I can. Once I have information on this person, I would definitely confront them in a situation created by me, which will be almost impossible for the perp to get out of.

Example: I would show up to their work place and seem like an interested party in their services. Will let them take the process way down the road and then pop the question about how they plan to pay me back for the money the scammed me. At that point, they would have more to lose than 1k, so chances are high for them to cough up a solid plan right then and there.

Someone tried to scam me for a car. Paid him check, dude sold me a salvaged car, with the carfax being fake. I made sure he paid me back my money.

UK seems to do much better at Cyber Crimes. In the USA the Police mostly deal with crimes IRL, federal agencies get involved with investigations into online crimes.

Not enough feds to go around solving every little petty crime, and civil disagreement on the internet. Which is why a lot of FBI busts are long term, big operation busts.

yup. just go to their house, "kindly" ask for the money back or plan your revenge

Hmm, it does certainly seem like they get more involved in it.

Calling the cops and letting them know is probably the best thing i would have done.

Defenitly wouldnt go near his house to beat him or something like that - only cause more trouble..

Good thing you already brought the vehicle now there is no need to call for one.
You are saving these people time you sir are the true hero.

Honestly that would be ironic. Seeing an EMT pull up to you beat your ass and then take you to the hospital.

I'd seriously be super confused I don't think I'd even have the right to get angry.

I've had to take someone to the hospital after fighting since I do MMA we were training but it was kind of funny explaining it in my report.
