Thread: Why you didn't commit a suicide yet?

Wolf - April 4, 2018, 10:38 am

What gives you the will to live?

Is it fear of death? Faith in your religion? Your loved ones? Hope, that one day, when you wake up, things will get better?

What would happen, once those things are gone? Family dead, hope turned into despair and your faith crumbles?

Are you living only for the moments you find pleasant, or your are more the type that wants to experience everything? When I say everything, I literally mean, everything life throws at you, which includes death at the end of a journey.

Are you abandoning yourself, when you are in fear, sad or angry, just because, society considers those things to be "bad" for yourself? No matter how you feel, what you think, what you do, you'll still keep a sense of self. You are unique and no matter what happens, you'll have to fully accept it first, before being able to change anything. For the starters, the world won't get any better. It'll get worse. But you CAN get better. By changing your perspective, everything changes and world will take on different colors.

You are precious.

"Commit a suicide" then tell us all about it on HF, in the form of an eBook $9.99 special deal for the first 10 to buy it.

I don't feel that my life is shitty enough to have to want to take my own life away from me.

Suicide shouldn't be a common thing in peoples mind but unfortunately it is.

Nothing from the outside. My opinion is that if your only reason to live is to experience something outside of you, or something that gives you temporary pleasure, than you're in danger, mostly because if that thing will disappear, then you won't have another reason to live.

For me, I guess freedom is what makes me want to live. And especially, the freedom to create different things. The freedom to write stories, to write what I think about, to write things that may help others. The freedom to design things, to draw characters, to code, etc.

For me is the freedom of creating things that keeps me alive. Whenever I feel like I have no reason to live, I just start creating something, and I realize, pretty soon, that by creating things for others, you have a reason to live.
