When the GDPR Comes into affect ip logging websites wont have the ability to do so anon anymore will they? Damn..

S???L?? - May 10, 2018, 4:29 pm

I hope that becomes real, but sadly it will probably be they collect ur info, then if they geolocate it or whatever the rules are then they will have to purge the data

You do realize that's Europe only, and the us is on the other side of the spectrum? In places in Europe with net neutrality - they can't take the site down for non compliance.

I mean your right but it'll still be ass when it comes into place.

soar-x - May 11, 2018, 6:57 pm

every site logs your traffic. so technically no link is "safe."

I hope most people realise the majority of sites of those sorts will not give a shit about GDPR. I know my site will not be complying, we are moving all our infustructure offshore

Very nice work you done here, you can add the WEBRTC exploit and you can bypass VPNs, i mean maybe idfk anything about this realm of tech.

Appreciate the site tho, learned alot about data handling.

luke - May 12, 2018, 3:00 am

I doubt many of these sites will comply.

They honestly don't need to as long as they are not catering to European customers.

Who said I'll be caught? There is no way for it to be linked to me. All is done from a remote server, using purely monero

You can build one yourself, it's hella easy. And if you couldn't, ip/browser look up scripts are available everywhere.
