You can change the sender ID to any number or text you want up to 11 characters. Be aware that there are a few countries to where this is not possible such as USA and Canada.

If you send a text message to USA for example, it will show up from a random number.

That's not what I said. You are allowed to buy this even if you're from the US. The spoof feature is what's not working on US numbers because of US laws. It's technically not possible to send spoofed text messages to US numbers.

(Jul 29, 2018 05:03 AM)Juffar Wrote: [\[CITE\]](#) That's not what I said. You are allowed to buy this even if you're from the US. The spoof feature is what's not working on US numbers because of US laws. It's technically not possible to send spoofed text messages to US numbers.

I'm sad I said my first post wrong did not intend to come off that way.

Time has passed now, I've done some exploration subsequent to posting this and now see how some fundamental low to high level spoofing would function.

A portion of the strategies I learned was

Intermediary proxy like how email spoofing is done

Cloning credentials

Counterfeit station for short range caricaturing MIM

Or on the other hand you can construct a librarie that can be utilized to send messages effectively from normal programming dialects like C#, Java and PHP.

SMS aggregators principle objective isn't to demonstrate the number is legitimate yet I discovered that there are companys that give API's that permit to send or get the content. At times there principle objective may be to approve the sender number and continually screen for abnormal things going on. You would get blocked entirely quick im speculating. On the off chance that you worked in the organization at that companys third party I don't figure you could discover all the odd use and one may not be perfect and miss one under the radar before somone notices. Spoofing is possible in the USA even at that level as they have the tool to name the sender.

Anyways you have a very nice service and I wish you the best of luck!
