Thread: Catch up day !

Vamure - October 12, 2018, 11:30 am

Hey everyone! I've been mia for quite some time and got some free time for the next few hours! I've been on a constant grind the last few weeks; with a bit of partying here and there ? . Just wanted to see some of my lounge buddies have been doing? What the fuck is up people? What is something new or exciting that's happening with YOU? Internet relate; or real life.

A successful man is one who can lay a firm foundation with the bricks others have thrown at him.

Welcome back. I have been staying busy with work and some night classes. Certainly looking forward to the new year when classes will be over.

Man I totally get the night thing! I worked night shifts basically the last two years; while balancing a ton of other shit. I respect the hustle. I'm personally the ttype of person who like's when classes are in session. I enjoy being around other like-minded individuals. Maybe like-minded is too giving; I enjoy being around other people who are actually TRYING to do something. Not being lazy.

Yeah, I definitely agree. It's nice for the social aspect however it gets tiring pretty quick when you work from 7:00-5:00 and have class from 6:00-10:00. Not to mention classes on Saturdays. It seems like free time is non-existent these days.

Oh god yes it's fucking tiring. Balancing a social life alone is tricky. I've been trying to push myself for more self-care because I haven't figured out a balance just yet. ???

I can relate to not being able to log in as much anymore. With college, studies etc, I'm finding myself with less and less free time.

It seems that way; mr popular ;) .

Im actually quite happy that I got some time to get on today. I've been gone for the last 3-4 weeks. 90%+ on every single fucking uni assignment so far ? . There's also a lot of stuff I can't really openly speak about just yet; but i've been a very busy vam in real life. ?

Well, since I constantly have access to computers at home and work I have no excuse to not be on. Except I kind of took a break for a while, I needed some time away.

The coding courses have been phenominal so far. The instructors are awesome and know how to explain everything in ways that the book never could. They require three levels of java classes at my university, and this is my third one. This is my first semester working with SQL and COBOL. I feel like I definitely learn alot more and faster than I would studying on my own.

There's also some shit professors though too that sort of screw you over if you get stuck with them. One of my Host Computer Security professors would just stand in front of the class and talk about his personal life for half the class and we never really learned anything of value in there. So It really just depends on you getting a professor that knows what they're doing.

I just always thought it'd be a bit more difficult to learn via an actual professor for some reason. Interesting. I might start picking some courses up here soon.

Trust me I totally get the professor thing. It can be your FAVORITE class but if you get stuck with a shit professor; you'll hate it. ?

As long as you keep up with the readings and other course materials and actually attend class, it isn't really difficult at all. Most profs will have a certain way they want your assignments to be done even if they can be coded using another approach without a problem, but it isn't hard to figure out what they want as long as you're in class and paying attention.

Learning by yourself would give you more freedom to approach the issues however you see fit but I think that getting instruction from people who have been in the field for 20-30 years speeds up the learning process exponentially (at least for me). Their specifications usually help you conform to good coding style standards that are going to be expected in the industry whenever I graduate whereas learning on my own may have made me more likely to pick up bad practices, depending on how I taught myself.

Props to anyone who does this stuff self-taught though, it can definitely be accomplished and I'm not saying you need to go to uni to be a good coder. Hell, there's even middle school kids out there that have taught themselves a respectable amount of this stuff. But IMO college is definitely the best way to do it
