This user PM's me out of the blue, never dealt with him, accuses me of selling his product which made me investigate his product.

So i took a look at his thread and instantly laugh at this.

His so called payment "proof"

Do you notice anything wrong? Maybe missing $ Symbols. The , instead of . is a common occurrence however we cant dictate facing from just the , but on every paypal email they always include the currency.

Lets look more into the vouchers profiles.

Why would someone selling the main thing the method requires vouch? As if he didnt already know the method xD So what you have one account selling the method then forwarding them to another, who knows the method and has a service yet "Purchased" your method.

Moral of the story. Dont PM people claiming they sell your method when your clearly being scummy with fake proof

That's a weak argument to base a community alert on...Google "Russian PayPal" and this will appear:

LMAO this motherfucker is a joke hahaha

My payment proof is legit from reputable members. You're a fucking joke here hahaha mate, sorry

In my country, we use a , not a .

Also on my PayPal emails, I also do not see a currency symbol.

And they dont always send the currency you moron, do you want me to ask reputable members for "forged" proof?

Also, on your other claims: he's using the method, you dont seem him with a contract for it. And if he's using it and being successful, why cant I ask him to post proof of earnings?

He sells the requirements for your method. A little odd right, your entire method is based of the service he is offering Mate, why is that relevant? The proof of earnings is not fake.

And that was your whole argument for my community alert...

i am in a group with bladdy and buyers of his method, and i have seen multiple posts in there with some members showing their payouts from this method. It is highly unlikely these are not legitimate

Or that Italian formatting rules would be similar to Russian formatting rules?
