Behind the story.

I recently made a thread about like search engines so me and my friends can use it and this dude pm'd me saying he got one and he custom coded it himself and then I was just asking around and if they seen this source before because he sent a pic of the index and one guy came up to me and send me the github of the source.

Proof:

Link: <https://github.com/Bundle/dataleaks> - the files he's trying to sell me for $200

Did you even go to repository's developers and read the original developer's bio?

Bro you literally tried selling me a file that's leaked when I asked you if it's leaked and you said no lmao

Show us the proof I said you "no, it is not leaked" or so

You never asked for a leak and I never said it is leaked nor shared.

"Open-source" is not the same as "Leak", totally different

You couldve just been a nice person and just gave me the link on the source instead of trying to get $200 from me lmao

It's another topic to consider which is not involving scamming in any way

You swore me on Discord and said lots of things against me. Now you are going to use my script after all that, sss

I recommended him to use that script, since it will save him decent amount of money. You could have been open about it and said it available on github.

I was throw off the project already before and planning to setup for him whenever he offers since I'm the developer of this and no one knows how it works better than me. That's why i asked him 3 times how much he is willing to pay but he prefers me to I make a quote. There is nothing to labelize that with "scamming"

I guess people don't have to give them freely if you can't find it.

I mean if you google it correctly it does appear tho. If you couldn't find an "open source" repo, it doesn't mean that man is a scammer.

As far as I see, he published his codes before. Then, saw an opportunity to make money from it. I don't see any negative behavior on this. There are lots of blackhat people who sell stolen codes or product. This guy is just trying to sell his old product, which is now open source.

Doesn't need to be dramatized.
