Probably like 7-8k or so. Had a few years of drug dealing in my younger years so cash was np. Now i dont really carry alot of cash, maybe 500$ at the most, all depends, my income is day to day, i dont work a normal job and do my stuff online, sometimes i might have little, at other times alot. Atm kinda broke, i got my basic needs but not much money to spend on fun, and what i got im looking to invest anyway. Gotta get back at it.

Plenty of people do. Not everyone necessarily wants their transactions logged in any way shape or form.

I don't know what my largest amount carried has ever been. Definitely several grand. I ran 3K to the bank today to convert into a cashiers check.

I don't "carry cash" so to speak, unless I am coming back from large sale in which case I only ever deal with cash. But even then usually I am most comfortable within my car. Although, I do not keep money in bank due to the corruption and untrusting views of banks in my country.

I think it is not stupid to hold your money in cash, just stupid / risky to walk around in public with large amounts of cash.

Yeah for countries that aren't tier 1 would make sense to sometimes carry cash but me in Canada can't imagine using cash, I hate lending money to losers because they don't have a bank account and try to pay me back in cash then gives me the burden of having to spend it or put in bank myself, not worth it to me.

Yea I bet there is a lot of homeless people walking around asking for spare change as well ?

Problem with cash for me is that it took a long time to learn not to over spend or lose my money. Nobody likes carrying around a shit load of small bills or coins, makes it so hard to keep track of your money. But yeah if I were fortunate enough to live there, I am sure I would have the same views. I have not much knowledge on the banks there, but probably a lot more stable than my country is for sure

But that makes you very transparent. They can figure out where you have been and can assume what you bought. I personally do not like that feeling

More and more countries try to go fully digital. (money wise) But that all comes at the cost of losing privacy. And if they block your bank accounts then you have a serious problem :)

Korvo - May 3, 2019, 8:05 pm

When I went to buy my car, I had 4k on me. It felt pretty nice having all that cash, but when I spent it that feeling went away quick lol.

Normally I never carry that much cash around on me, it was just a one time thing. Other than if I am buying a big ticket item I very rarely carry cash on me. Debit is just a lot easier imo.

But hey, some people really like the feeling of carrying cash.

You are correct, and make a very valid point. Although cash in some countries such as America may be better in terms of privacy, but still not as much people may think.

In terms of privacy I only use privacy oriented currencies such as Nano, Monero,ZEC and other great technologies.

Disease - May 4, 2019, 10:30 am

Around $9,000. And the only reason I did so was due to traveling and wanting to convert cash without withdrawing in the other country.

My wife and I moved to Peru (where she's from) for a few months a few years back. I brought that cash down to quickly convert it into Peruvian soles, to have spending money on day one. Moving money via wire transfer or check deposit takes time, and Western Union transfers means going to a shop and them being capable of dispensing enough money. Quite frankly most shops aren't sitting on 30,000 soles (what $9000 generally works out to), and you can easily lose your shirt on fees and conversion rates.

As for why $9,000- it's just under the cap before you're required to declare it with Customs. Obviously I wasn't moving money for anything illegal. But it's a headache to try and explain why you're moving cash outside of the country. Especially to a country like Peru. Staying under the legal limit of $10,000 makes it easier, as it doesn't require declaring.
