Omniscient - June 13, 2019, 7:52 pm

I'm recently feeling this urge to troll hard on social media. I'm using Twitter, Youtube, and Instagram more often. And I see these assholes all the time and I wish I could just give them a piece of my mind and call them out for their bullshit.

But I'm worried my accounts will get shut down. My comments removed. I'll get hate replies for my hate comments.

Anyone else feel this way? Like you just want to be an asshole to these fuckheads but the damn rules keep you in check and it feels like your voice is stifled.

I suppose it's Twitter most of the time because I'll see some something in my feed or in Moments that just pisses me off. I gotta click away but I get the feeling of disgust I can't expunge. I wish I could tell these people right on their accounts what twats they are.

Example....

This fucking idiot has a 8m Twitter followers.

<https://twitter.com/danielhowell>

Why? I don't understand it. He has some shitty ass videos on YT. He's not particularly funny or entertaining. And in Twitter "Moments" he gets a "Basically I'm Gay" share.

Two things I really wanted to say...

1. Who gives a fuck you're gay?
2. You fucking idiot, anyone watching your videos knew you were gay anyways.

Twitter is so sanitized.

SIM-3257834 - June 13, 2019, 7:57 pm

All these trolls fall under "online influencers" and are sadly protected by this.

Lavish Living - June 13, 2019, 8:02 pm

In my experience, you can say literally anything you want on twitter

ohxerxe - June 13, 2019, 8:02 pm

Social media is a shit show. You can be banned just for having differing opinions.

As for the gay guy, I remember way back in the day when he was I guess more relevant on youtube. And yes it was always obvious he is gay but I think its so big right now because of his influencer status.

Coordinated trolling missions are always fun too.

Omniscient - June 13, 2019, 8:09 pm

Quote: In my experience, you can say literally anything you want on twitter

Then how come I never read anyone flaming? If someone else flamed I'd at least LIKE the response. All you see is happy replies. Twitter doesn't even have a DISLIKE option. It's all fun and smiles. I like Twitter the platform overall but I wish it wasn't so biased. It just feels like it's a leftist political agenda site. A lot of Moments related to shit I don't politically agree with. Twitter does a bad job of knowing what I'm interested in.

That seems a bit immature.

Yup. Lost all faith once I got into the PR manipulation industry.

Social Media is fucking dangerous. And we are being manipulated.

Porn - June 13, 2019, 8:19 pm

Everyone has to act positive on social media, for example in the e-sports scene if you are a professional player for Cloud9, NRG, G2, etc.. and you make one wrong comment/reply they will drop you faster than a fat kid chasing an ice cream truck.

I am about ready to just delete my personal account because I absolutely hate the moments section. The worst part is that it knowingly goes against my advertising topics. I downloaded my twitter data to see if it has anything relevant. Cars, tech, technology, NBA, and several travel related topics should not mean the freaking top thing featured is "These are the top 20 Democrats who have qualified for the debate stage" and "Brazil's Supreme Court criminalizes homophobia and transphobia".

Great. I just wanted to see if there is any good trash talk on game 6 or waste some time looking at Koenigsegg's Jesko red cherry edition to see if would cost three or five times what I would be willing to pay for one.

Even if someone is totally in the wrong, you cant blatantly call him retarded you have to sugar-coat it.

Charlie Sheen - June 13, 2019, 8:23 pm

It's funny you post this, I actually had to force myself to leave Twitter today. I can't stand all the celebrities and made up celebrities trying to push their own political views down our throats 24/7. Finally had enough when some verified page tried to ignite a race war over Tim Allen getting busted for cocaine 40 years ago and not being in prison in life "when his homies are looking at life for a little crack".

1. People who give a fuck enough to say something about it.

It's not about who cares or doesn't care. He got your attention and just gained more popularity from you viewing his content and sharing it with others. It starts from follower #1 to follower #8,000,000.

I don't use twitter except for when I need support from companies that only use twitter for help. Instagram is only for seeing family and nature pictures. YouTube I only use for music, golf, and hockey.

Quote:Anyone else feel this way? Like you just want to be an asshole to these fuckheads but the damn rules keep you in check and it feels like your voice is stifled.

Why not stifle their voices by not viewing their content or using social platforms except for personal and business use only? Sure I may be Out Of The Loop more, but I certainly feel more at ease not knowing things like who Cardi B was till I read threads about her here. Maybe you won't silence them on social media, but you'll certainly silence them in your own world.

This is why I like Reddit. You are able to subscribe to the content you would like to see. You don't see stupid posts shared by friends about subjects you don't shouldn't care about. Some of my favorite subreddits are AncientCoins, AskHistorians, CoinRings, and Woodworking. Specific content without interference of toxic content.

Not much you can do about it except ignore. Retards will continue to be retards no matter how much you humiliate them online or offline. Punches in the face won't work, too. My life was much more peaceful until I heard there are people that think earth is flat. Like how mentally challenged you have to be to think that with all the satellites and real time proof... Why can't they create like categories we can opt-in or opt-out of? Google does this for their news pages on my mobile and it's great. I can focus on topics I care about. Would be nice to see Twitter Moments do something similar. I see too much stuff related to pop culture. I'd prefer topics like Sports and Tech more than the fact Taylor Swift did something.

Quote: Why not stifle their voices by not viewing their content or using social platforms except for personal and business use only?

As an owner of site that does rely on connecting to the community I have to rely on social media as an indicator of what's popular online. There are times where I have to adjust and learn and adapt based on community needs. Part of that is understanding social media. So I must have a Twitter account. It's not really an option for me to ignore these popular mediums of connecting to members.

It's starting to feel like the anti-bullying movement has gone too far and that kids who get participation awards are too soft. Sometimes you need to be told you're a worthless piece of shit. That you're not talented. That you're a fucking douche bag. But kids today get hugs and love and soft cushy lives where anything that upsets them gets banned or criminalized. USA has the fattest people on Earth but if you fat shame someone you're the monster. Fuck that fat people are taking up massive amounts of health care. Seeing people post on their idiotic beliefs and misguided thoughts makes me believe that this really is going to be the end. It does not take much at all to start a cult following and once more people abuse tech for its true power, it's over. The only option will be to literally just get away from it all.

Riggs - June 14, 2019, 2:40 am

I'm conflicted on this. On one hand, I hate censorship, regardless of how inflammatory expression is, and am a strong advocate for a completely unregulated Internet. That's the thing about chaos, it's fair. On the other, I'm also an advocate of the concept "those who fight monsters should see to it that they do not become monsters themselves". That being said - from fakenews to trolling, the whole social media concept affords all walks of life the option to engage in exponentially difficult to regulate fuckery. It's impossible to remain independent from the trolling of social media whilst being a participant of social media.

Sadly, using accounts directly associated with your identity/business risks you losing your license to speak. If you do go ahead with it, I recommend making sure your risks are carefully calculated prior. Trolls will identify and fuck with your weaknesses, but obviously you already know this from managing HF for over a decade.

I think the first step is stopping news sites from having ads lmao. That's one of the biggest issues imo - the monetization. I get that it's only fair and whatever and maybe disallowing ads is too far but something needs to be done middle ground.

Agreed, although there are still purely non-profit publishing orgs that don't have ads that still reflect bias. There's been some interesting arguments made over the past few years about having AI as a solution to the fakenews epidemic, as AI could mitigate many of the issues inherent in human-level journalistic bias.

I hate how people on big platforms can spew out a lot of shit and think it's okay, I have seen so much stuff on twitter that is a joke and when I've seen serious replies on people defending something within the comments it's all hated on. That's what social media is nowadays a giant meme fest and Troll fest.

Yet again this is why I will only follow people who I know their comment section has some intelligent people there.

It's so easy to make a video or a bold statement on big platforms and if you have a big following a large percentage of your following will always agree with you and side with you even if they know you're wrong fucking bully mentality. Another great reason I don't like to go into the comment sections too much because I'll always see some shit that will trigger me & usually to find the most common sense replies you need to scroll through all the bullshit that's where the sane people are.

I was suspended on twitter for telling some left wing shit stain to shut the fuck up and that he is a stupid cunt. After he threatened to kill my family and burn down my house. Nothing happened to the toerag as well. These morons always play the "victim" card all the time when they get called out or get proved that what they think is wrong. It is fucking stupid as fuck. Speak my mind and I get called "Racist, Homophobe, Islamphobe, (Islamphobe is not a word but leftists use it) Sexist ect ect" even though most of it wasn't even the argument. They just throw it in their to make themselves look like they are always right.
