I have a deeply seeded fascination with psycho/sociopaths.

Just the way they tick.

The amygdala of psychopaths are smaller than what they're supposed to be,

And the amygdala is what controls empathy.

That's why they don't do well with feelings. It's very common in people with high IQ's

Normality is such a subjective idea.

Normal is just a word tossed around by people who feel the need to fit some mystical societal hierarchy.

Who decides the threshold of normal?

Documentaries are interesting yeah but I think a lot of people are curious about them.
