It's a simple trick you might not know, and doesn't work everywhere but if you just want a secondary account and you need a new unique email address, you can do this trick i tested on few sites and working like a charm

Basically gmail doesn't make difference between a username with dots and one without it For example j.walker@gmail.com and jwalker@gmail.com are the same but also j.w.a.l.k.e.r@gmail.com

Meanwhile most sites consider string inputs different if they contain dots or not So if you try to login as j.walker@gmail.com, you cant do it with jwalker@gmail.com
And if you try to register twice it will recognize the same email but not the one with a dot also verification works (generally) so basically if you just need a mail to register with, add a dot somewhere in your original email, you still receive the mail, it will be unique, it will work

SO no need to redirect your mail or create new addresses or new emails if your goal is to create a new account on the same site just add a dot somewhere in the name before the @ yes it means anywhere and each of them will be unique on site so if you need this for any reason, you can have a lot of combinations with it like registering yourself in a game twice or referring yourself, creating a facebook for a friend, whatever is your reason you can test it by mailing yourself and adding dots into your mail, you still receive the mail from yourself it might not work for all the sites but it works for quite a lot
