Thread: Indian coder scammed me. Yes or no?

Roberto Scorpius Malfoy - November 20, 2019, 4:17 pm

Well imma make this text short.

I got in touch with a indian company that I explained what I needed

IOS&Android app and I told them exactly everything I wanted and so on..

They checked the code and got back to me with an amount we both agreed on 1300 USD.

The job was supposed to be done within 100 hours of jobtime 50 hours on each app.

After the project was delayed with 2 weeks I started to get worried because there were always buggs and shit.

Then the worst thing that happened was when they started to ask more money and the reason can be found below:

Spoiler (Click to View)

We got the Vasa taxi project at the cost of 50 hours for each platform.

However, it took 108 hours on android and 57 hours on web. Also we started the iOS yesterday, first it took 2-3 days to do the setup because of the dependencies in code. Finally we did it and when we went through the code we found that it will take about 200 hours and it will take a month to complete all the changes.

Kindly confirm the time, then only we can go ahead. Otherwise, it is not possible to continue as we already invested more than double of the given cost.

So yea as you can see according to them it will take another 200 hours to complete the IOS and that will cost me 2000 USD. Do you guys consider this as a scam or does this kind of shit happens in the coding world??

Root-Senpai - November 20, 2019, 4:19 pm not normal in the coding world, you certainly got scammed! if you agreed on terms, and they did not uphold, then they are screwing you over.

always pay a small amount upfront or use an escrow service! if people deny escrow they are likely trying to screw you over

Ravioli - November 20, 2019, 4:20 pm

Any reason you tried to get this from an Indian company? Just tryna save a few $?

I mean the project manager was kinda nice, he told me that he feel sorry for me and informed me to contact the person who first coded the apps for me and that it might be cheaper to go through them, if not i should get back to him thats what he said.

Bear - November 20, 2019, 5:02 pm

Not normal. politely ask them to abide by the agreement you guys had. If they deny it, then go talk to a lawyer or go to your bank, however you paid them, to reverse the payment.

If they decide to not politely comply, just verbally tell them to go ahead with the work and to consider the initial $1300 as the down payment to go ahead. Once they are done, convince them to send you some of the work or most of it so you can make sure this time. Since they were trying to pull a fast one with you, just take the work and stop replying to them.

Its a very scummy thing to do, but some times you gotta go into scum to fight people like that.

In all seriousness I would not accept a job like this for only $13 an hour total (that's not even counting their unpaid hours). Half goes to taxes so what you're left with is pretty much nada. These people have offered you a new estimated time schedule for the completion of your project even after performing unpaid hours which is only commendable. Knowing that there's probably more than one person working on this, the pay for a single developer would probably be around $2 or $3 an hour.

To people saying that this is not normal, you haven't been in software development. Things like this happen all of the time. Literally all of the time. Projects fail all the time due to wrong time schedules and the truth of the matter is that the project lead and managers are responsible in situations like this or should take full responsibility since they are the ones that presented the project. If their time schedules are incorrect, you can either continue or blow the project off. But seriously, less than $13 an hour in total for a team of people? That's peanuts. Hell, if I was getting paid 13 an hour (and that's just talking about my pay, not the total pay for an entire team per hour) I'd probably kill myself. Your budget is seriously low for that many working hours.

I'm not sure why some people are making it seem like "all Indians are scammers". I've done majority of big deals online with Indians that went smoothly without hiccups.

I can say they put in work and reliable, well whenever I use them. I probably have about 5-6 people from India currently doing projects or work for me, without any issues. Shouldn't judge people because of the country they're from.

Aside from that, your budget was extremely low and you should of known better in my opinion. Maybe try to work out a deal with them on finishing the project, otherwise congratulations you wasted your time.

Agreed. Thats why it's always good to sign a deal agreement before actually sealing the deal and paying the company. I do freelance work, and I've actually written up a deal contract and converted into a pdf file, so when I get a customer, I have them sign this, and email it back to me. Keeps all the legal issues at bay.

Why did you pay?

I mean it should go like this.

Pay a retainer

When they send you the code to check over, don't send payment until it's check. In fact, don't pay until the job is complete.

You did yourself when it came to this deal as you did two things wrong;

You came to the table with $1200 for 100 man hours. I don't know about you but $12 an hour is not even minimum wage here, so that's insulting enough as it is. You're not going to find someone that will do that and not scam you.

Use your brains and pay us what we deserve.

This is why we never find good clients, because you're all trying to save money and it never works does it?

Good luck, maybe next time, chip in the extra 1k and pay someone for their time instead of wasting it on some indian scammer

Preach it brother.

OP let me tell you something. You asked for 2 apps be done within 100 man hours. You didn't have much luck finding a reputable firm. It doesn't matter they are from India, you have idiots pretending to know how to develop software everywhere. I don't know what was your request but I'll assume that isn't something that can be done by basically anyone, 50 hours per application is simply not enough.

Not to mention your budget which is laughable for something like that.

Cooligan - November 24, 2019, 6:28 am

Well, granted if they are coding for iOS and they didn't know anything about iOS before this, I can see why they'd have a hiccup. Apple/iOS only allows their apps to be coded in Swift, no other languages are allowed like on an Android or in the Play Store. They might've not known this and now have to re-work everything? Not sure. Either way, be very careful as everyone knows what India is famous for right now; scams, scams, and more scams.

I don't think it really matters, it's horses for courses.

In the end, if you don't persist with due diligence and you don't conduct some sort of quality assurance, this is always going to happen, it doesn't matter of the offer (Unless OP was intentionally trying to lowball someone).

Also afaik Swift is comprised of C, Objective C++ and swift code, doesn't seem too difficult if you know at least two of the three
