Recently I found out that I can listen to/watch a maximum of 3 news stations at a time and still able to retain the information that's given. I trained this skill over a long time by first trying to pay attention to two super unrelated TV shows/topics (because it was easier to switch back and forth in my mind) and eventually got good enough to do more than two at a time and process information from similar topics with different viewpoints. Learning this has definitely saved me time, I just wish I was able to do this in high school lmao.

Does anyone else do this?

That's pretty cool, although I imagine sensory overload must happen every now and then? I can do it to a degree with listening to two things at once, namely podcasts and the news at the same time if one happens to come on while I'm listening to the other, but it's not something I'd really do out of choice. Have you tried doing it with two or three videos of your school work topics?

I can normally watch my class, up to 6 People at once. (i never really counted it properly)
Listen to up to 3 other convos between each other, mostly I just remember their reactions etc. They are always like " you are everywhere but we don't know about you " i blank stare but i see them everyone.

I've got a weird one.

Think about when you're in the shower. Imagine how the water is hitting your skin. Think of it as being slapped VERY fast by different particles.

I can do that with my hands/mind - I can vibrate my hands back and forth and send signals so fast and move my eyes, and body very fast. I can look straight forward and blink so fast that it looks like my eyes are open or closed at all times, kind of like spokes on a tire when it's spinning.

I've successfully taught the blinking to my little sister with very intense instructions... still convinced we soul swapped because of it, lmfao.

Also, my girlfriend loves my fingers because of that... ;) I type around 132 wpm when i'm focusing because of it too.
