I've been aware of this for a few days. I'd recommend if someone has in fact bought some sketchy shit with shitpal you'd better start scrubbing. States want big data, so this is what they're doing. Data breaches are essentially what? Cyber weapons?

I doubt they can do anything to the customers.

Not sure what they can do to the customers.

Do you really think they wouldn't try to scapegoat identity theft, or possession of stolen property? (Yes, property can be intangible) ?

Wasn't that a RAT though? People can be buying a subscription to WLI to see if their data is out there or if employees for a company are vulnerable.

If companies want that then they use Haveibeenpwd since its known and is legit. no one working at a legit business is gonna say hey man lets use that weleakinfo site to find our info.

That's certainly a valid argument, but if they decide to "search" someones PC, and they find information such as a folder full of doxes, a setup RAT (lets say the open it and find computers connected "holy shit a felony"), etc. I'd like to play theatrics, but as a law school drop out, just trust me on this one. Secure yourselves, make good secure choices when conducting yourselves, and prepare for the worst. If not, and they show up. God help you, for the queen won't. ?

Yes due to it being used by 40 percent of hf users at least one time.

genesiseher - January 20, 2020, 1:37 am any other thoughts on this? as in how long before the owner is captured as so far said they arrested the staff members of site not actual owner but can only be a matter of time.

Now if you were born with at least half of a brain you would know that at some point the FEDS would come swoop down on you hard for doing this so it was already a matter of time before they found out and seized the domain and servers hosting the site.
