Thread: Someone threatened to kill me today.

MrJamesDean - June 28, 2020, 12:39 pm

Today I was down by the woods near where I live to collect wood and to check on some of the local wildlife as there's some newborn fawns that were straying and ending up in gardens only to get chased by dogs or whatever. I saw one fawn that was caught in some string tied to a tree, so I naturally go to remove it and set it free. The second it's free and runs off, some asshole came out of nowhere with a hunting rifle literally screaming about how I stole his kill. I explained calmly that it was a small fawn, that the mother would have been likely nearby looking for it, and that it's bad form to kill younglings and or mothers caring for them. This guy pokes me with his rifle a few times, I stay calm, but then raises it to my face. A brief scuffle happens, and then he threatens to kill me and says he'll find out where I live and shoot me through my windows... I've had threats before, but this has really put me on edge because he was clearly unhinged and crazy enough to point a loaded rifle at my head over freeing up a trapped fawn. I just don't know what to think right now.

Odds are he's just some hillbilly hothead who's gonna go stew over it, get shitfaced and forget. You did the right thing OP, I wouldn't worry about him but if it's a serious threat to you, contact someone about it.

I hope so man, I don't know why but this has really put me on edge and I've been in much scarier situations before. I just hope he gets help and doesn't actually take it out on me, he had that look in his eye that's freaked me out :(thank you!

should have beat the shit out of him and taken his rifle and said it back tbh - but that's coming from someone with no real gun experience so idk if he could have popped you before you hooked him Imfao

If I'm being 100% honest, there was three opportunities for me to grab it and disarm him (I've done basic training) but there was no way to tell he didn't have a hunting knife on his back or side and I could have been cut real bad before being able to get enough distance between us, so I had to just kinda wait for him to stop and back up. I'm still kinda shaking from the adrenaline, I hate it!

I'm aware of the emergency services, but we don't call them often around here, especially now while there's a pandemic and riots in nearby cities. I'd just be sat up all night waiting for them to come, say there's nothing they can do, and leave.

you hate the adrenaline from fighting? that shit is the best feeling hahaha, fighting (like boxing or combat sports or just random street fight/scuffle things) is always fun imo but less fun if they pull a weapon

It's more that I hate how long it lasts for, like I never notice it in the moment and the immediate rush does feel good, but it's the long ass period after like now :(it's been over an hour since, but I'm still quite tense thinking I should have done more or should have been more aware, I don't know man. I'm in the US bro, right out in the sticks too so it's kinda a self governed area where we don't get much if any trouble, but sometimes stuff like this happens. Yeah pistols are definitely still scary in the moment, but you're probably more likely to survive a close range pistol shot than a rifle, just be glad you don't got those floating around haha. Glad nothing happened to you with the pistol though, as far as I know!

Pistol vs. rifle makes very little difference at point blank range since dead is still dead. Don't mess with crazy people. Once you are sure you aren't about to be shot on the spot, you put as much distance between yourself and the crazy as you can as quick as possible.

Clearly a terrible hunter if he was going after a fawn at all and especially one that was hardly able to move. Reporting him to the division of wildlife or whatever its called in your country generally results in revocation of hunting permits and hefty fines.

Yeah I think he's one of those vindictive hunters, and now I'm thinking of it he may have set up the string to trap the fawn and shoot the mother. Either way it's completely unacceptable here, we don't tolerate the hunts of fawns or mothers, so he knew he was in the wrong and probably why he overcompensated with the threat. I've reported it to the park marshalls we have that police some of the areas for illegal hunting and or illegal activities on the lands here, so hopefully they will keep a better eye on things!

To be honest it completely took me by surprise because one second I was watching the fawn hop away, and then all of a sudden this guy was up in my face and poking me with the rifle. I think I handled it okay but afterwards I was thinking "should have filmed it, should have disarmed him, should have reported it straight away" etc, just one of those fast moments that I wasn't ready for in the moment. Thanks though man, appreciate you!

Pawnhub - June 28, 2020, 2:32 pm

My guess is you fucked with his trapping snare and pissed him off.

Given his response wasn't appropriate at all. Next time let him have the kill and look up the laws on hunting deer in your area.

Fawns are usually protected in all states here in the US I would have just reported him and let your local wildlife management fine then ban his ass from hunting.

Get his photo or his plate number or even his name if you could and they'll take the right actions against him also if you mention his agressiveness you could easily get him arrested through your complaint.

If what you seen was this around the deer. 99% sure it's outlawed in most states completely. Also who the fuck hunts in the summer, it's a great way to catch multiple diseases as animals like deer become more sickly prone to infections and any type of worms is usually transmitted during the summer or in extreme heat.

Yep it was very similar to that, more loose string but I've seen them set up in the past to trap rabbit and smaller fauna. In the moment it looked like random debris, but it makes sense now looking back that he'd set it up and was hiding in wait to get the kill. I've spoken to a ranger this morning, I'm a really early riser so caught him before he went out and he said there's been more than one report from others about it so they're on the lookout now!

Yeah that's your best bet because any type of wildlife commissioner would slam him for doing what he's doing.

I hunt every year during hunting season down south here. Deer can't even be taken before October here and these assholes who think it's legal to hunt year round really screw it up for Licensed hunters who pay a hefty amount to be able to hunt.

The way they screw us is when they kill these animals on public land, when the rangers go about and document how much game is left in the area. That dictates how many people can enter certain areas during hunting season and how many animals we can take (quotas). Nothing pisses me off more tbh then getting deny'd on a quota because some pricks decided to eat some bambi's or hunt out of hunting season.

Sorry I'm ranting but damn it got me riled up ?.

No don't be sorry, you're absolutely right about all of that. They screw up our livelihoods sometimes and cause us all damages because they cause area closures and waste police time, just because they wanted to kill a baby or deprive the young of their mothers. I've hunted, but we do it when it's allowed and to the older males, never during fawning season. I have some good news though that I'll post at the bottom!

Just a quick update for those who followed this; after I reported it to the rangers and made them aware, they had said others have made similar reports and took their findings to the police. They worked out who it was from a very similar report last year where he'd done the same to someone who knew him personally, and he's been located and apprehended. Not entirely sure what will happen next, but he's most likely going to be charged with a number of offences and they're stripping him of his hunting and fishing licenses!
