Not necessarily a two person job, but just laundering the money at this point. Getting it into different wallets so they wouldn't be detected.

I am actually surprised it wasn't more than $120k. Some of the biggest account on Twitter saying they are giving away money. You would think they'd earn $2-5m. Are people smarter than we think? Or is Bitcoin really that underground that mainstream people didn't know what it meant. Probably that most people couldn't figure out how to get Bitcoin fast enough to send to the scammers imho. Crypto people know this scam too.

Hack one of the biggest sites online. Earn $120k. Seems sad imho. I bet they'd pay $500k bounty if they did nothing and told Twitter about their intrusion. Twitter would have paid hush money imho, prevent potential reputation harm and stock decline.

I wonder what the hackers are thinking about all this?

True, there could've been more ways to make much more money than it. As for the stock, it didn't get affected much from that news. $TWTR has already been struggling since the crash so it held against the news pretty well.

The update confirmed that Twitter had been the victim of a social engineering attack, putting paid to rumors that the hack could have been an inside job.

According to the report, the July 15 incident started with a spear-phishing attack, targeting a small number of employees by telephone to gain network access credentials:

"Not all of the employees that were initially targeted had permissions to use account management tools, but the attackers used their credentials to access our internal systems and gain information about our processes."

The attackers then used this knowledge to target additional employees with access to account support tools.

Oh, so it was the guy selling the Twitter @ recovery services all along.

I believe one day before the hack he posted on that forum saying he can change email of any twitter account. His account got cleaned there now

Yep, stuff like that is always bad publicity to a forum, or that's at least what I think. People saying it was him, but I didn't think it'd be him because posting stuff like that to a public forum, then doing the whole hack after would be a good idea. That's like asking to be caught.

Hmm, all these news outlets are mentioning this "Chaewon" beside his real name so I think they are pretty sure

Yep that's what I'm talking about. A lot of people used to claim it's him like 10 minutes after it happened before anything was proven. It's just stupid to go out there to sell a service like that and then hack every known person on Twitter.

They did get involved in it and they knew the risks. I personally don't want to be a part of anything illegal.

They're not going to be able to charge him as a Adult, he's going to get a super easy sentence. I remember being 17, "The get out of jail free card" was very alluring to me.
